"M.A. (OXON.)"

We regret to have to state that the expressed intention of our esteemed contributor to resume "Notes by the Way" in the present issue must be deferred. Rheumatic pains, flying about the body ever since his fall, have developed into a severe attack of rheumatic gout, which finds his enfeebled system an easy prey. He is confined to his bed, suffering great pain, and quite unable to attend to anything.

PAPERS OF THE LATE MRS. HOWITT WATTS.

[Among the papers of the late Mrs. Howitt Watts was a little MS. volume, which she used to call "The Brown Manuscript." This she believed to have belonged to the late Robert Chambers. It contains stories of somnambulism, second-sight, clairvoyance, trance, vision, and ghostly visitation. They were probably collected by Mr. Robert Chambers, and, on Mrs. Watts' lamented departure, I received them for publication in "LIGHT." This was her intention had she been able to carry out her desires.—"M.A. (Oxon.)"]

VIII.

VISION OF THE TWO WIVES.

Mr. Oliphant, formerly one of the arbitrators in Lloyd's in London, was a gentleman of great respectability and of good fortune. He was a Highlander by birth, distantly related to Lord Oliphant. At times he used to amuse his friends by recounting histories connected with the superstition in the Highlands. By the grave manner in which he recounted them it was evident that he himself had faith in the strange gift of the Highlanders.

Mr. Oliphant was married to a lady of most attractive manners and amiable disposition, and who possessed many accomplishments. She, having a strong mind, was consulted by her husband upon all his private affairs. He had the misfortune to lose this lady after a very short illness. This misfortune so much affected him that for some time he was quite unfitted for business.

Some months of his widowhood having elapsed he was one night lying awake in his bed, when he saw—according to his own declaration—the figure of his wife enter the room. She was attired in black; with her came another lady attired in white, like a bride. To this lady the phantom of his wife directed his attention by pointing toward her.

The two figures glided towards a door opposite to the one by which they had entered, and left the apartment.

Mr. Oliphant sprang up, and, running to the door by which the ladies had vanished, called his wife by name, but he saw no one there. A nephew of Mr. Oliphant's who was staying in the house, hearing his uncle call the name of his wife, and open the door, ran into the passage, where his uncle related to him the strange vision which he had just had.

This circumstance revived the grief of Mr. Oliphant and in a short time he appeared to have lost his reason, and also, it seemed, his affection for his wife's memory, for he immediately set off travelling, in search, he declared, of the new wife whom he that night had seen in vision.

He visited Scotland where the connections of his family resided. When his relatives saw him they determined to follow him to Edinburgh, in order there to place him in confinement.

Two nephews followed him to Edinburgh, and for two days sought him in vain. They then met accidentally their uncle in a carriage with a lady seated beside him, —both being dressed in light-coloured apparel. Mr. Oliphant recognised his nephews, stopped the carriage, alighted with alacrity, warmly greeted his nephews, and with the ceremony of a finished gentleman presented them to his wife, to whom he had been married the previous day.

His conversation was perfectly sane. He took his nephews to a furnished house which he had hired, and where everything was found in perfect style and order.

During the course of the evening, when in the drawing-room with the bride, one of the nephews learned from her that she had met Mr. Oliphant at the English Chapel in York-place, as she was leaving, after the marriage of one of her relations. To the surprise of the wedding party, Mr. Oliphant accosted her, saying, "Madam, I have been seeking you ever since my dear wife introduced me to you," after which he burst into tears.

Mr. Oliphant's comportment had been so frank and genuine that he had interested the gentlemen present, and he had been invited to return home with the bridal guests. That evening he told the history of his vision to the lady whom he had thus arrested, and implored for an immediate marriage. Mr. Oliphant being known to persons of high respectability in Edinburgh, all inquiries were answered in a very satisfactory manner and the result was their immediate marriage.

At the time of the marriage, and also when his nephews thus visited him in Edinburgh, he appeared perfectly in his right mind, and they sincerely hoped that all would be well. Within a few weeks, however, both his nephew and his wife felt that it was not safe for him to be at liberty, and he was placed in the establishment of Mr. Hughes. There I have spent many an evening with him. In his apparently sane moments I have repeatedly heard him relate the history as here written by me.

His second wife never saw him again. He died at an advanced age.

He asserted repeatedly to me that the lady whom he married as his second wife was not only the same person whom he had seen with the figure of his first wife, but that she wore, when he met her at York-place, the same dress in which he had beheld her that night. He regarded this as an instance of the second-sight of the Highlanders.

SECULARISM AND SPIRITUALISM

[This article is written by one of the ablest exponents and defenders of Secularism in this country, to whom we give a hearty welcome as a contributor to "LIGHT." Reverent criticism, no matter from what source it comes, can, we believe, only result in benefit to Spiritualism. Moreover, it is well, at times, to be able to see ourselves as others see us. "Sidney Short" is, of course, only a nom de plume, assumed for reasons explained to us, which are perfectly satisfactory.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]]

It is most interesting to trace the growth of religions, and institutions, and to see how they illustrate and confirm the opinion that the principles of evolution which have been discovered in the worlds of animal and vegetable life are of universal application. The laws of development (which are often summed up in the one word, evolution) are as binding upon the individual as upon the race, and it only needs the exercise of sufficient care and patience to discover in any particular case that the changes which occur are in conformity with such laws.

Isaac Taylor wrote on the "Natural History of Enthusiasm," but I do not recall any attempt yet made on the Natural History of Conversion.

This field also will be worked in due time, but, meanwhile, we should try to keep the ground clear from unnecessary weeds, which will, if left unchecked, become a mass of unnecessary entanglement.

Conversion means always a turning from and turning to. It does not mean an increase of knowledge, but the adopting an opinion which is incompatible with that previously held, and therefore the abandonment of such previously held opinion.

A few examples will at once make this clear.

If increased study produces the conviction that monarchical institutions are better than republicanism, the man so convinced is converted to monarchical views, and if his views had been altered in the opposite direction he would have been converted into a Republican.

If he had held protective tariffs to be beneficial and therefore necessary, he would, if convinced that Free Trade was preferable, become a Free trader. He would have been converted from a Protectionist to a Free trader.

If the Protectionist had from study become a Republican, it would not be correct to describe him as converted from Protection to Republicanism, for Republicanism does not necessitate the abandonment of Protection.

Conversion only takes place when a man changes his way of action in the prosecution of the same pursuit, or alters his views respecting one and the same group of mental ideas.

If a physician is converted to Homœopathy he adopts a different method of attacking disease, and if a politician is converted to the doctrine of Free Trade, he changes his view respecting one problem of political economy.

Now we would ask—Can anyone be converted from Secularism to Spiritualism? I consider it impossible. Can anyone be converted from vegetarianism to Præ-Raphaelism?

Every one will see it would be impossible. Both are impossible cases, and for the same reason—they do not refer to changes of action in the same pursuit nor change of view respecting the same group of mental ideas.

The recently reported conversion of Mr. G. Chainey to Spiritualism leads me to attempt to put clearly before Spiritualists the principles of Secularism, and to shew that both views may be right and that they are not incompatible with one another. If a Secularist becomes convinced of the genuineness of the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, and accepts some of the most important conclusions, he need not therefore abandon any of the principles of Secularism nor cease to lecture from its platforms.

What does Spiritualism teach? If I at all rightly understand its lessons, they are chiefly two. The first relates to an extension of the views of matter, or to a different way of viewing phenomena from that which is adopted by the materialistic school. This clearly cannot contradict, nor be contradicted by, any principle of Secularism. The second lesson relates to the extension of personal, individual existence beyond that catastrophe which we call death.

Spiritualism, then, relates to speculative views about another life; while Secularism relates to conduct in this present life.

A man's speculative views of a possible future life may be changed without necessarily altering his views as to the conduct of the present life.

He may, on the other hand, change his views respecting morality or conduct in this life without changing his views about any future existence.

Of course he may change his views regarding the present and the future, but in that case a double conversion takes place.

It may be suggested that in these matters we are only quibbling with words—but not so, for we have only to put a clear image before us of some physical changes to see the exactness of our reasoning. Perhaps the simplest image would be when red discs and white discs and red squares and white squares are used as signals.

The red disc may be exchanged for a white one, or a red square may be substituted for the red disc. In the first case there is a change of colour, and in the latter a change of form.

It would be meaningless to say the red sign was changed for a square sign, and if such words were used they indicate that in the speaker's mind the roundness of the sign was present though only the redness was expressed.

We may let white colour stand as a sign for Spiritualism, and red colour for Materialism, round surface for Secularism, and square surface for religious authority—we then see that we may have Secularism with either a spiritualistic or a materialistic colouring, and religious authority with either a spiritualistic or materialistic colouring. We at the same time see why Secularism can be exchanged for religious authority and Materialism for Spiritualism—and why it is impossible to be converted from Secularism to either Materialism or Spiritualism?

The interest of this subject to my mind comes from my belief that Spiritualism may be true, and my strong conviction of the necessity for the spread of Secularism, and my dread of the mischief which results from the teaching of religious authority.

If, having achieved freedom of thought, we add to our knowledge some truths of Spiritualism, we shall have one joy which fuller knowledge brings; but if we allow our minds to be enslaved by new chains forged by Spiritualism out of the links of the so recently shaken-off superstitions, our last state will be worse than our first.

"The doer, not the dreamer, breaks the baleful spell
Which binds with iron bands the earth on which we dwell.
The brow of wrong is laurel-crowned, not girt with shame,
And love, and truth, and right, as yet are but a name.
Oh dreamer, wake! your brother man is still a slave;
And thousands go heart-crushed each day into the grave.
From out time's urn your golden hours flow fast away;
Then dreamer, up! and do life's work while yet 'tis day."

SIDNEY SHORT.

PROPHETIC VISION.—The Religio-Philosophical Journal gives this from a correspondent:—"The following is a family tradition, as having happened to my ancestress, Mrs. Fell, about the end of the last century. Her husband was an officer in the British navy. It was in the time of the war with France, and he was away on service. She lived in London. While sitting with her infant and nurse, she had a vision of her husband's head passing before her, his eyes gazing upon her. In due course the news came of his having been killed in action; a cannon ball had taken off his head. The event coincided with the time of her vision, of which she had taken a note."

ON FACTS OF THE DIVINING ROD.

III.

Dr. Ashburner, in further exemplification of the relation between the odic effluence from human hands, demonstrated by the experiments of Reichenbach, and that from branches of trees, demonstrated as we have already seen, relates the following instructive cases:—

My patient Mrs. G. has a maid, Harriet P., who is highly sensitive, easily succumbing to the mesmeric force. I found her a good subject for experiments with the hazel and whitethorn. On a stick of either being presented to her, she took hold of it with avidity, and in less than a minute passed into the mesmeric sleep, denoting that the effluence from the stick had induced a tonic state of the nervous system and even a spasmodic state of the muscles, rendering it difficult to loosen the stick from her grasp.

The hazel and whitethorn induced the same phenomena in other patients; in two of them, a stick of either being held towards them, with the end upwards which is upwards in growing, it exerted such a force upon them that they seized it with both hands; one of them would run after it, and getting hold of it would appear supremely satisfied, soon passing into the tonic state of sleep; but if it were turned before she reached it, tapering end downwards, it exerted a repellent force, and she made gestures of repugnance.

If while one of these sticks was being held by any of these patients, the upgrowing end upwards, a piece of gold, or the pointed end of a rock crystal, were applied to it, the stick would be hastily dropped, with the exclamation that it was hot. A male patient, who had been several times put into the mesmeric sleep by passes, on holding successively pieces of these sticks, felt with each a tendency to sleep, and a sensation of heat.

Another patient, Susan L., highly sensitive, while in the sleep-waking state, exclaimed that she saw "a shower of fine little sparks" come from a piece of hazel which happened to be in my hand. When I quietly changed the stick for another of fir or ash, she saw nothing, but again the "little sparks" when I resumed my hold of the hazel or whitethorn. Her perceptions in this experiment were always the same, and they were tested in various ways. Eight other sensitives were separately tested as to their susceptibility to the effluence from different kinds of wood, and each gave corroborative results. Numerous others, with lower degrees of sensitiveness, gave different results; with some, indeed, they were inappreciable.

The sensitiveness of Mrs. G.'s maid, Harriet P., was put to very practical use. In a letter to a friend now lying before me, Mrs. G. writes from her place in the country:—"July 9th, 1845.—We have made a curious experiment here with Harriet P. My husband, the water here being very indifferent, has had wells dug time after time, in the hope of finding better; but none being productive, he finally said he would make no further trials. I suggested one with the divining rod, as they do in Devonshire; he did not object, and Harriet was willing to hold the rod. So we provided ourselves with one of hazel, and accompanied by two friends staying here, we went to what seemed to me a likely field. Upon my putting the rod into Harriet's hand she went into the sleep, and then held it with both hands so tightly that I, in order to release her grasp, applied my gold chain to it, as I saw Dr. A. do; then she held it with one hand, and, taking her own way, walked about slowly until she stopped suddenly as if shot. The rod then turned slowly round, twisting her hand backwards, and she exclaimed, 'Here's water! Don't speak; let me look!' She sank upon the grass as if giddy, again grasping the stick with both hands. Having marked the spot, after a little I woke her."

Mrs. G. goes on to write that in the evening she mesmerised Harriet into the sleep. On referring to the morning's work, Harriet remembered everything, and said that the water seemed about a yard beneath the surface. On subsequently digging to that depth, water rose; and Mr. G. had a well sunk there which furnishes a good supply of excellent water.

AN AMERICAN SCIENTIST ON THE DIVINING ROD AND PLANCHETTE.

At the Electrical Exhibition of Philadelphia, Professor Raymond delivered a lecture, reported in the Progressive Age, on the Divining Rod. He said that in remote times, it was employed for various purposes, among others to aid even in detecting criminals; that in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it was in common use throughout Europe in the hands of searchers for springs and metals. Numerous treatises were written about it; the theory in them most generally adopted being in accordance with the Cartesian philosophy, which taught that from all things in Nature pass emanations of infinitesimal invisible corpuscles, each of its kind, and each kind influencing sensitive individuals in a special mode appreciable to themselves; the operators with the divining rod being sensitive to those from springs, metals, &c.

The lecturer described the rod most commonly used in America as a small forked branch of hazel, roughly trimmed to the form of the letter Y, the forked ends being held in the operator's closed hands, palms upwards; the stem, pointed outwards, was expected to dip downwards when the operator, walking around, came over a subterranean spring or metal.

The lecturer said that if he adopted any hypothesis in the matter, it would be Chevreul's, in which, as he stated it, the words temperature, heat-conductivity, sensitive, unconscious volition, and minute muscular motions, figure in a bewilderingly "mixed" manner; but that, after all, he was more inclined to regard the divining rod as a lingering remainder of a once strong superstition, entitled perhaps to the same consideration as the Planchette—an object of study, it may be, from a psychological point of view, but not worthy of the attention of scientific geologists or "prospectors."

To this lecture, the Religio-Philosophical Journal says, "one of our correspondents has drawn our attention. After satirically suggesting that, if it were possible to use the wand upon the heads of some of our scientists, water might be found, and that at no great depth," he goes on:—"The only way of meeting assumptions based upon ignorance and scientific prejudices, is by the statement of facts—and here is one. My own highly-esteemed mother could, with the wand, as described by this lecturer, find water, and even approximately state the depth at which it would be met with. At Sigel, Illinois, where all trials to get water had proved futile, and well-sinking had been abandoned in consequence, my mother, when visiting there, was successful by this means in discovering several springs."

"The discoverer in these cases is only a passive participant in the operation, a medium, just as the electrical telegraph wire is."

"Last spring she discovered water for a well at my own place, quite contrary to my own and the calculations of some practical men. She was also right in her anticipation as to depth and quantity, estimated by her by the force exerted through the rod in turning over in her grasp."

"An experiment was once made by a 'doubting Thomas' of an investigating turn of mind; he coated the ends of a hazel-rod with sealing-wax; upon my mother holding it by the waxed ends there was no result, while by the bare wood, over the same spot, its movements gave the indication of the presence of water.—J. C. Hoffmann, M.D., Jefferson, Illinois."

Contradictions of Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have to ask you to allow me to thank your correspondents who have noticed my letter, and have striven to give me information on the vexed subject under consideration.

I wrote at a time when much verbiage was used on a topic which I considered beyond the depth of the public mind, viz., Theosophy or Occultism; and the despair produced by such conflicting opinion dictated my words. In reply to "E.H.W.," I consider that "reason" cannot help us in the matter of Spiritualism. We can only reason according to our knowledge of things, and as we can have no knowledge of the other world except by hearsay, reason cannot be brought into play. The real state of affairs in the "future" may be contrary to all our reason and expectations; we have to receive our information without being able to say "Yea" or "Nay," and our only question can be "Is the authority reliable?"

We certainly do want to know what is in the spirit world, and my difficulty is that I cannot get to know in such a manner as to make the information satisfactory. For instance, why should not two or three spirits, controlling the same medium in immediate succession, be able to give a description of the topography of their sphere, in the same way as a tourist would? and yet I invariably cannot get this, although there certainly is a spiritual landscape? Whenever I try this with an illiterate medium I am disappointed, and the affair looks suspicious.

To "A.E. Major." I think there is a misprint in my letter. I wrote (I believe) unworldly notice of the occultist, not "unworthy." I believe the motive which animates an occultist to be entirely unworldly, as we understand the word.

I do not seek to grasp the whole subject while here; I only complain that in the simple matter of reliability we are at sea, tossed to and fro, our rudder helpless, our compass demagnetised. The spirits do not vary in their morality—that is perfect; but it is only the morality common to all men, free from sectarian bias; and, as such, is no speciality of Spiritualism. I do not even seek for a higher spirituality in Spiritualism than I can find out of it, because my observation has dispossessed me of that idea. I find that Spiritualists are no more spiritual or moral than their neighbours, and that they are as earthly and as jealous. I will, however, give them this credit; they will spend their talents and time to benefit the public to their own detriment. The advice of "A.E. Major" is applicable to all men, "humility emptying out of self," but it does not give any light upon the subject of spirit control.

To "Lily." I know that some spirits are disembodied men, with like passions as ourselves, but there is this difference. We can perceive our men, when receiving information from them, but our "spirits" are behind a curtain, beyond our grasp, and we are totally at their mercy, as regards any proof; and where you can test them once by means of two different clairvoyants you are a hundred times unable to bring such methods to bear. The "contradictions" are some of the things which are the great stumbling blocks, and if these contradictions can spring from lying, tricky, misinformed spirits, or are produced by the bias of the sitters, how can we decide what to believe when "Reason is helpless in the matter," as I have said before? I don't think a mind requires any calibre to comprehend a simple fact or statement. It is not in the hidden mysteries of God's deep works that the trouble lies, but in the statement of simple facts, which any spirit must know if it has any knowledge at all.

The advice "Lily" gives is such as should certainly insure good results, but is it not in the experience of every mature Spiritualist that these results do not follow? Witness the affair which was related some few years ago, of the family which commenced their private sances with earnest prayer, and were for months the dupes of lying spirits. I also know of a medium friend who is in the most susceptible and suitable condition for control when he has had a few glasses of beer, and at that time the tone of his discourse is most elevating; no one could take exception to its quality, if the source were undoubted. But the query arises, How much is due to the medium and how much to the spirits? With regard to the MIND of the sitters, I remember that a few months ago a score of sincere investigators were sitting with a physical medium for materialisation. I feel certain that guile and deceit were absent from our minds; but what did we get? Three yards of calico. I question to this day whether the medium was a trickster or not, but yet evil results followed good intentions. In other words, while we were waiting for a form which dimly appeared between the opened curtains, a sitter, a thorough Spiritualist, seized the white something and found in his hands "calico." The medium protested that he did not know anything about the affair. If the spirits brought that calico from a distance to cheat us it was most certainly not caused by the state of our minds. Whether the medium cheated us or the spirits did so, I cannot decide. In any case "sincerity was rewarded with deceit." In none of the letters which have appeared in answer to mine has there been given any light on the subject. These letters are full of advice and warning to Spiritualists like me, but they don't teach me how to "discern spirits."

The opinion of "C.C.C.'s" Jesuit father, and indeed of many others, that the controls are mostly evil spirits, is not close enough to the facts of the case. I cannot believe that such prayers and morality, and the forbearance exhibited by spirits in their intercourse with us are the offspring of evil.

There is a depth of feeling and reverence in the prayers of the most illiterate medium which I have never witnessed in any normal speaker; an absence of rant and of familiarity, which is so painfully manifest by its presence in many good preachers. If evil can assume in such a manner the garb of light, how shall we tell which is which? It is a fiction about "the devil appearing as an angel of light." Vice and evil carry their trade marks about them. They may conceal ulterior and wicked motives, but we are not deceived when the cloven foot appears. I have never perceived anything immoral in any control, even when the medium has been no saint. I don't think "evil spirits" solves the question. "C.C.C." is a happy man; he has the truth. And so says the Protestant, the Mormon, the Hindu, and the Materialist. And someone ever asks "What is truth?" Happy man to build such a religious structure on such a basis, with such lofty results, as is evidenced by his religion.

To F. W. Thurstan, M.A. Although six persons might be unable to agree as to the apparent size of the sun, they would have no doubt as to whether or not there was one shining. The facts or phenomena point to a very probable solution, which yet does not cover all the facts, and it is this: That the embodied spirit has power to read the history of individuals while the body, or mentality, belonging to the said spirit is unconscious of its power. There is so much of the individuality of the medium in the communications that this is a plausible explanation; and yet I am conscious that the explanation does not cover all the ground, but only a part. If Occultism had not reared its head against Spiritualism I should have been satisfied with the latter; and if my personal experience of Spiritualism had not been long and critical I should have been satisfied with Occultism. As it is the one clashes with the other, and I can exclaim "How happy should I be with either, were I other dear charmer away." The spiritual theory is certainly the simplest to me; but that does not make it true. With all my doubts and disappointments in Spiritualism, I love it still, but I want to know it in reality, and not in doubt.—Yours sincerely,

ESOK.

Spiritualism from a Roman Catholic Point of View.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Would you kindly allow me to remark that Signor Damiani's letter in no wise touches my objections; or proves that there is anything new to be learned from Modern Spiritualism, although of course to the gentleman in question some things may appear new, while to others the same doctrines are quite ancient? In the first place Signor Damiani has learned from Spiritualism that "eternal punishment is a myth." In that case he has learned a consoling, and to our human comprehension, a reasonable doctrine; but at the same time spirits have certainly taught that the punishment for evil doing may be so prolonged through endless cycles and phases of existence as almost to merit the name "eternal," seeing that this is a word of which our earthly conceptions can form no idea. The Infinite and the Eternal are those things which "cannot by searching be found out," as an old, old book declares. But even this is not new. Origen in the third century taught that "devils and reprobates should be saved after one thousand years," and that "souls were created long before this world, and for sinning in Heaven were sent down into their bodies as into prisons." Tertullian about the same time taught somewhat similar doctrines; for instance, that souls were of a corporeal substance, and increased and decreased with the size of the body. True, both Origen and Tertullian were excommunicated by the early Church, but many learned Catholics have been in doubt as to whether certain of their doctrines were really false, or whether they were excommunicated for arrogating to themselves a right of speaking with that "authority" which only belonged to the chief Bishop, and before the proper time had come for properly expounding such doctrines. "I have many things to say, but ye cannot bear them now."

Then Spiritualism has further taught Signor Damiani that neither "priestly absolution nor purgatorial fire, fasting and abstinence, rosaries, scapularies, reliquies, and the like, have anything to do with the grand religion of Christ, much less with salvation." Now the fact is that if Spiritualism teaches these things, it teaches nothing new, seeing that he could have learned the same from Protestantism in general, and so could his great grandfather! Really, this information cannot be called new, and the only question remaining is whether it is true. Some spirits have testified to the benefit derived from all these things. The value of relics, &c., &c., has even been explained to some extent by mesmerism, and that by spirits at sances!

Perhaps Signor Damiani may say that these are spirits still labouring under delusions. I certainly would not be prepared to argue that question, nor enter upon their defence on that head, but I will only say that they were quite as likely to be correct as those who gave information of a contrary nature.

Then Signor Damiani has also learned from Spiritualism that "the greatest sinner, after atoning by remorse and repentance, is sure to enter the course of eternal progression, and that there is none infallible but our Father God." Most certainly this is a Christian doctrine, and how on earth does it happen that Signor Damiani did not learn it long ago at school from his Catechism? The only difficulty is the grace of acquiring a true remorse and repentance—a grace, alas! which does not descend on all sinners.

If Signor Damiani is, or rather has been, a Catholic, he knows full well that we believe in the infallibility of the Pope only because we believe the Infallible One speaks through him in matters ecclesiastical; and we also believe that we have sound Gospel authority for this belief;—but controversy of this kind is out of place here, and I only allude to it because Signor Damiani, while scouting sundry Catholic beliefs and practices, yet appears to believe in the infallibility of those spirits who have improved his views of religion!

For the rest, I quite agree with Signor Damiani, that if those "millions who have passed from belief to Atheism" can be brought to believe in immortality by Spiritualism, or anything else, they have much to be thankful for. But I fear that comparatively few have their eyes thus opened, for it is pretty much now as in the days when Jesus said: "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they believe if one rose from the dead." Still, if even a few such Sadducees have been brought to believe—as I remarked in my former letter—to such, Spiritualism has certainly been of use.

Signor Damiani asks how I can possibly confound Modern Spiritualism with witchcraft? But I would ask in what particulars it differs from ancient necromancy, of which witchcraft is only another form? When once you have your spirit called from the "vasty deep,"—if you had only sufficient power and requisite knowledge, you could compel him to bring you some of the treasures of the deep! and you could also get him to torment your neighbours! and aid and abet you in doing likewise if you were so disposed! This, I believe, constituted "witchcraft," and I must again say that there is positively nothing new in the fact of communing with spirits. On the contrary, it is as old as history itself, and perhaps dives far into pre-historic times! Who knows whether the pre-historic skull at the South Kensington Museum was not that of a powerful medium, prime minister to a pre-Adamite king! one of the Genii kings, for instance! Doubtless, Signor Damiani considers me a barbarian because I would not repeal the laws on witchcraft! But certainly I would not if a "witch" be a disagreeable fact; because the possessors of such power could be more deadly enemies to life and property than if they were armed with Martini rifles, or carried an unlimited supply of dynamite.

Can such things be? people will ask. But the readers of "LIGHT" can easily conceive the possibility of their existing, and it is highly probable that the knowledge of certain truths was the cause of the continuance on the Statute Books of these laws. For instance, the law of Scotland makes it penal to invoke or FEED or deal with a "familiar" spirit in any way. The spirits who boil kettles and light fires, were well known in Scotland in former days under the name of "Brownies," and the goodwives were wont to make them offerings of milk and cream, &c., &c., hence the prohibition of "feeding" an evil spirit. At the same time the poor "Brownies" scarcely seem to have merited the name of "evil spirits." I have often sighed over their departure when a child, and dropped a tear to the memory of fairies no longer interfering in human affairs, by making things pleasant for good boys and girls!

I will not trespass farther on your valuable space except to reiterate, and that without fear of contradiction, that Modern Spiritualism is not, as some of its disciples fondly imagine, a "new and glorious revelation," but, on the contrary, only an old and (if carried much beyond its present development) a dangerous practice, which would doubtless lead to the same goal to which it has always led from the days of Moses, down to those of Queen Anne of gracious memory; or, I believe, even to those of George I. High and pure Spiritualism is simply religion, and in that respect it bears more or less relation to all revealed religions, and its true value consists in carrying salt, as it were, into those already existing, instead of trying to found a new sect, which, mingled with low Spiritualism or necromancy, could only end in disaster. It is well known that some Spiritualists welcome even the control of evil, or undeveloped spirits—as they call them—in the light of improving their (the spirits') morals. However, much I may differ from Madame Blavatsky, I am bound to say that she acted most charitably in endeavouring to warn those foolish people of the useless danger they incurred.

However, even this ultra charity is not new! It was anticipated by an old Scotch clergyman of the last century, who, after praying for every man, woman, child, and herd of cattle in his parish, said at last, with a sigh, "My brethren, let us pray for the Devil! Nobody prays for the Devil!"—Yours truly,

C. C. C.

Mr. Stuart Cumberland's Challenge.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Morning Post tells us of a challenge by Mr. Stuart Cumberland and Mr. Labouchere, M.P., to Mr. W. Eglinton, viz.: that they will do by "natural means" what he professes to do by "spiritual methods."

If the lecturer and the legislator do that, I will undertake to eat their great coats and pay liberally for my dinner.

I met (by invitation) Mr. Stuart Cumberland, when, at the Charing Cross Hotel, some four years ago, he made his first appearance on any stage. I witnessed there his imitations of spiritual phenomena, and I then, in a brief address to his audience, told him they were as like the "real thing" as a lump of chalk is to a piece of cheese.

He may have improved his sleight of hand since this; but if the challenge be accepted it will be simply that; no more, no less: that is to say, if a fair, just, and honourable jury be appointed to try the case.

You will, no doubt, shew cause why the sum of £2,000—a large sum which I do not think Mr. Eglinton could "deposit"—should be placed in hands other than those of a gentleman for whose one thousand pounds an excellent and valuable London charity is yet patiently and "hopefully" waiting.

But I fancy the sum named (£2,000), which it is quite certain never can be raised to "deposit," is something like challenging a man who is paralysed in both hands to a duel à l'entrance with swords or pistols—giving him a choice of weapons. In a word, it is known beforehand that such a challenge cannot be accepted.—Your obedient servant,

S. C. HALL, F.S.A.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3RD, 1885.

A DEMONSTRATION OF "THE PASSAGE OF MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

In 1854 I sat with Home on his first arrival in this country, and was at once forced to believe in spiritualistic phenomena, because, among other evidence, I was permitted, in the light, to touch detached "materialised hands"—in form, size, temperature, and sensation the exact counterpart of human hands. Subsequently I obtained still more palpable evidence in the presence of the Davenport Brothers, and in experiments with Lotty Fowler and Slade. But although I have for thirty years from personal experience known that such hands can be produced by occult means, it has only been during the last three weeks, in which I have sat with three well-known mediums, that I have had my many years' belief in the possibility of the materialisation of the entire human form converted into a positive knowledge that such forms are produced.

It is not, however, my intention in this letter to enter into the question of the materialised human form, but to confine my remarks to the question of what is called "The passage of matter through matter," a subject which has always had for my psycho-physical turn of mind a fascination stronger than any I have yet experienced regarding any other form of spiritual phenomena.

The two seances I am about to describe were held in the house of my friend, Mr. Stuart-Menteath, and the medium was Mr. Husk, and all the sitters present were well known friends, viz., Captain James, General Maclean, Mrs. Fitzgerald, the Rev. Mr. Newbold, Mr. and Miss Stuart-Menteath, myself, and others.

At the conclusion of the first seance "Irresistible," having promised to give us, if possible, a demonstration of the "passage of matter through matter," requested Mr. Newbold to hold Mr. Husk's right hand, and Captain James to hold his left hand. He then requested Captain James to rise from his seat, when "Irresistible" immediately took the chair Captain James had risen from, and threaded it on the arm of Mr. Newbold, who had retained his firm grasp of the medium's hand throughout.

An experiment of this kind may be regarded as complete; and the evidence so exactly given in Zöllner's book as translated by Mr. Massey under the title of "Transcendental Physics" may logically be considered as a settlement of the question; but facts so astounding as these can scarcely be realised by the scientific mind, without a proof personal to oneself, and this proof I got during my second seance with Mr. Husk.

I may here mention that for four years I have been experimenting with my iron rings, and in the Spiritualist for 1880, and in "LIGHT" for 1881, I described how I got my iron ring many times, under test conditions, passed on the wrists of those present, but never until the 18th December, just passed, has the iron ring been placed on the medium's wrist while I held his hand, and thus shewn from personal experience that such feats were to me absolute facts.

The experiment I had with Mr. Husk was in this wise: The seance was held, as I have said, at the house of Mr. Stuart-Menteath, and at the end of our seance the spirit who calls himself "Irresistible," said to me, "Dr. Wyld, I am now going to try to pass your ring on to the wrist of the medium; and I wish you to hold his hand in order that you may be perfectly satisfied." To that I replied, "It is very kind of you, 'Irresistible,' but you know you have never, during the last four years, been able to pass my ring when I have held the hand of your medium, because, as you have always said, my 'magnetism' was too positive for you to penetrate, cutting your 'magnetism,' as it were, at right angles." To which he replied, "Yes, but I think I can do it now, and I will try, if you will hold the medium's hand, as I wish you to get positive evidence."

Accordingly, in the dark, I took my place at the medium's left hand, and with my right hand held the fingers of the medium's left hand in a firm and determined grasp. I then passed my left hand over the medium's arm and wrist to satisfy myself that no ring was thereon. "Irresistible" then gave me my own oval ring to hold in order that it might be ready. I was satisfied it was my own ring from its oval form, its size, and its thickness. He then took the ring out of my hand and rung it three times on the table, and then said, "Now, here goes," or words to that effect, whereupon the medium, who appeared to be in deep trance, gave a cry as of pain, and struggled convulsively to escape, while I redoubled my energetic grasp of his hand, and, light being called for, to my astonishment and delight, I found my own privately-marked ring on the medium's wrist; and I am now absolutely certain that my ring was placed there by an occult process called the "passage of matter through matter."

The evidence is as follows:—

1. The ring I had specially made of an ovoid form in order that from its flatness it could the less easily pass over the rounded form of the compressed hand and yet have the shape of the flat wrist.

2. The ring contained my own three private marks.

3. The ring was made according to measurement, of a size to render its passage over Mr. Husk's hand, according to the assertion of all present, by normal means impossible. The long diameter of the oval ring was 2.75 inches, the short diameter was two inches, the mean diameter was 2.375 inches. The internal circumference measured almost exactly 7.8 inches, and the thickness of the iron was 5-16ths of an inch, while the circumference of Mr. Husk's compressed hand, as measured by a cord tightly pulled by myself and General Maclean, so as to indent the flesh, was found to be 9.15 inches. The ring was thus by measurement, as we had all found by experiment, of a size impossible to pass over Mr. Husk's hand, and when it was on his wrist we found it equally impossible to remove it. But in a few minutes, as we all walked about in the light, the ring fell off the medium's wrist as if it had been a large ring.

4. But even if it were possible to pass an object whose dimension was 9.15 through an aperture measuring 7.8, only, this impossible possibility was rendered manifestly impossible by the passage being debarred by my own hand.

5. I satisfied myself that the ring on Mr. Husk's wrist was my own ring by its private marks.

6. I satisfied myself that the ring had not been tampered with, but was intact, by suspending it while on the medium's wrist by a string, and ringing it.

7. I satisfied myself by examination that there was no ring on Mr. Husk's wrist or arm previous to the experiment.

8. I therefore again assert that we have in this experiment a demonstration that spirit power can suspend the cohesive force, and by an occult process perform a physical feat which transcends the greatest known wonders of chemical or electrical science.

Having been for four years labouring to get this test, I need scarcely add that my long-suffering patience was completely rewarded, and I had always been told by "Irresistible" and others that I should at last succeed if I persevered.

9. With the exception of the medium, the sitters were all in a normal state of mind, and neither asleep, intoxicated, mad, biologised, nor banded together to lie.

My sensations on receiving this demonstration were intense, because I then knew that the impossible to science as at present taught, was possible to spirit, which was thus shewn to be an intelligent force before whose will, chemical, and mechanical, and magnetic forces are as servants. It shewed me that the teaching of Materialism was untrue. It shewed how the Lord of the spirit was Lord over matter, and it suggested how we, when we have shuffled off this mortal coil, shall be able to surround ourselves with, or separate ourselves from, objective material forms according to the will of our imaginations, or affections, as has been so profoundly said by Swedenborg.

MR. W. EGLINTON.—We are asked to call the special attention of Spiritualists to the fact that Mr. Eglinton has changed his address. It is now 11, Langham-street, Portland-place, W.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK. XI.

The conversion of one of the two most eloquent advocates of Secularism in America, and the fraternal correspondence of these two—Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Chainey—on the subject, are matters of deep interest to all Spiritualists. Every reader of the two leading organs of Secularism in this country, the National Reformer and the Secular Review, can see that they are conducted with extraordinary ability, and a devotion to what the writers hold to be the truth which is above all praise. If I do not always admire the methods and style of their protests against the popular theologies, I can recognise the martyr spirit even in those who spend their lives in the sturdy denial of all the facts which assure us of the reality of a spirit life.

A secularist like George Chainey, once convinced of the reality of Spiritualism, cannot fail to give his knowledge to thousands of those who most need it. I do not forget that it was a secularist lecturer converted to Spiritualism, who was the means of giving us such a medium as Mr. Eglinton, who, from the Ganges to the Mississippi, has given to thousands visible, audible, tangible evidences of immortality.

The erection of a Spiritual Temple in Boston, the most cultured of American cities, by a wealthy and devoted Spiritualist, at a cost of a quarter of a million of dollars, is an example which we may hope will not be lost. But before much can be expected in this way there must be some order and organisation. People do not make such offerings to any cause until they have some reasonable assurance that they will be wisely used for its promotion. For a truth like Spiritualism men will give freely the moment they can see that their gifts will extend its comforts and blessings to those who need them.

But one thing is needful. There must be a broad, liberal platform. The creed of Spiritualism must be very simple and very comprehensive. The two words which end the Apostles' Creed—"Life Everlasting"—may be enough. True, it has been the faith of the whole human race from time immemorial—but it is a faith now dying out among the most cultured peoples in the world. Faith is not enough, and therefore it is being replaced by knowledge. We, who are Spiritualists, have that knowledge, and we are trying to give it to others, because all knowledge is good, and all ignorance and falsehood is uncomfortable and dangerous.

It is true that this knowledge will come to all in time, but that is not a good excuse for withholding it or for not seeking it now. All men need it for comfort or for guidance. The highest motive any one can have for all right and noble action is the fact of immortality. Men and women are heroic in the hope of being remembered after death. How much stronger is the motive to all good deeds when we know that we shall live on and on to enjoy them. To have an honourable epitaph—to have one's body moulder in Westminster Abbey, is something—but to live with those for whom we have laboured seems to us much better.

Yet people ask:—"What is the good of Spiritualism?" The good! Consider for a moment what it has done for every one who has examined its phenomena—or, to use a better word, its facts. It has removed the dread of death. It has banished the horrors of Calvinistic theology. With the assurance of a continued existence it has brought also the prospect of eternal progress in wisdom and love, and all that constitutes the joy of life. We have a reasonable hell—if we deserve one. We have no less a reasonable heaven within our reach. In peace, in hope, in assurance of knowledge, we do our work cheerfully, ready for the change that awaits us.

Really! what can we do better for the world about us than to give to others the knowledge that we find so good and so pleasant for ourselves? What can we do better than to clear the minds of men of the horrors that are preached to them every Sunday from thousands of pulpits, in which men labour to make God a fiend, and fill a fiery hell with nine-tenths of all humanity, destined by the Eternal fore-knowledge to be tortured to all eternity! This horror, taught to millions,

Spiritualism has destroyed; and people ask, "What is the good of it?"

One of the best newspapers in England, if not the very best in some ways, is the Weekly Chronicle of Joseph Cowen, M.P., Newcastle-on-Tyne, a man so truly liberal that he came from the House of Commons one night to preside at a spiritualist meeting addressed by a distinguished scientist, also a resident of Newcastle. Needless to say that the Chronicle has been open to the facts of Spiritualism.

In a recent number, the Weekly Chronicle gives Lord Lindsay's—the present Earl of Balcarres—description of the famous levitation of Mr. Home, when he was carried out of one window, seventy feet from the ground, and brought in at another—a stupendous miracle, witnessed also by Lord Adare, the present Earl of Dunraven.

In the same paper is published an interesting account of "The Willington Ghost," "A Night in the Haunted Mill," and "What Mr. Hudson Heard." This haunted mill was some years ago visited by the late William Howitt. Forty years ago a Dr. Drury spent a night in the haunted house with a friend, Mr. Thomas Hudson. He saw the ghost, which he described at the time as "a female, attired in greyish garments, with one hand pressed upon her breast as in pain, and the other extended towards the door," and as the ghost approached his friend he gave a most awful yell, fell, and remained unconscious for three hours.

Now, for the first time after forty-five years, Mr. Hudson, the friend, gives his account of the strange noises they heard, and of Drury's "hideous yell," when "he sprang up with his hair standing on end, the picture of horror. He fainted and fell into my arms like a lifeless piece of humanity."

This is another of the ghost revivals pervading contemporary literature—revivals as well of the Supernaturalism of Shakespeare and Goethe. But the effect of Modern Spiritualism—the carefully observed and scientifically investigated facts of to-day—upon our literature is only in its crude beginnings. The time is not distant when it will be all-pervading.

REVIEWS.

PALINGENESIS; or the Earth's New Birth. Glasgow: Hay Nisbet and Co.

This book purports to be the joint production of "Theosophy, a Minister of the Holies, and Ellora, a Seeress of the Sanctuary," and to describe future events as seen in a series of visions. It is one of that class so numerous now-a-days which are no less the perplexity of the Spiritualist, than the scoff of the sceptic. Well meaning, and up to a certain point rational and practical, it nevertheless deals in aspirations and predictions the most extravagant and contrary to the nature of things; and yet is written with so much earnestness as to suggest, on the part of its author or authoress,—for their plurality is not invariably maintained,—complete unconsciousness of the incongruity of the parts and incoherence of the whole. Animated by a strong sense of justice and piety, it propounds schemes for the reformation of Church and State, even to providing a new doctrine and ritual for the former, with an indifference to orthodox worthy of a Gnostic, and a minuteness of ecclesiastical detail worthy of a Levite. Not content with this, "Palingenesis" anticipates the time when the planet itself, as well as its inhabitants, will be regenerated, and not only rearranges the disposition of sea and land on the surface, placing them in alternating stripes like the bars of the Zebra, but, borrowing the idea of Lord Lytton's "Coming Race," peoples the earth's interior, and traverses it in all directions with railways. To the volume which contains all this is added one of plates and diagrams, two dozen in number, elaborate, large, and coloured. Whether the book is intended to be taken literally or allegorically, is not stated, and we are unable to decide. That it has been a labour of love and one involving no ordinary expenditure of time, labour, ingenuity, and money, is beyond doubt. But so also, we fear, is the prospect of its finding but little appreciation by the public, for the judgment, which ought to have presided over its composition, is sadly conspicuous by its absence. We say this with regret, for we recognise and respect its feeling and intention. But our duties to Spiritualism are paramount; and it is Spiritualism which has to bear the responsibility of the shortcomings of its professors. When will Spiritualists understand that things are not necessarily Divine because spiritual, and that abnormal mentality is not necessarily inspiration?

A SHORT SERMON FOR SPIRITUALISTS.

An amusing American story relates how a member of the National Congress offered a wager to a fellow member that he could not recite correctly "the Lord's Prayer." The bet was promptly accepted by the second, who immediately repeated the following:—

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

"I—," said the first one with a big oath or two, but drawing out his purse and handing over the ten dollars, "I didn't think you could ha' done it."

Supposed citations from the Bible, not quite so bad as this, even by intelligent people, are not rare. How many have attributed to that book Franklin's well-known Parable, or Sterne's pretty as well as pious sentence, "He tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb," or the popular saw "A merciful man is merciful to his beast," or the statement that "Eve ate the apple," or that Saul consulted "the witch of Endor." But none of these probably is so generally and undoubtingly held to be genuine "scripture" as this—

"As the tree falls so it lies."

Or, as sometimes phrased—

"As the tree falls, so shall it lie."

Who has not heard this many a time adduced in proof of the great doctrine of the continuity of character after death, even to eternity? Often may it be heard from the pulpit in support of the frightful dogma of everlasting punishment. I have even found it in the published discourses of eminent divines, who evidently thought it to be strictly biblical, and equivalent to another piece of "minister's scripture" (as I was early taught to call misquoted texts), "As death leaves us, so will judgment find us."

One need not then be surprised to find it in a recent number of "LIGHT" (No. 204), in an article by a very intelligent correspondent, who cites it as setting forth the great truth that "souls take with them into the spirit world their ignorance, weakness, falsity, and selfishness, and remain in a purgatorial condition until they abandon their besetting weakness." This very important truth, which I fervently wish might be believed and profoundly felt by every human being, I am certainly not about to impugn. But I wish to say very distinctly that it cannot be rested on any such text in the Bible, for there is no such. And not only so, but the words of which it is a distortion will bear no construction that even approaches this in significance.

The proverb, for such, indeed, it has come to be, has plainly been manufactured out of part of a verse in one of the books attributed to King Solomon, called "Ecclesiastes, or the Preacher" (chap. xi. v. 3). And so palpably is it an utter misconception of the meaning of the author as to force the inquiry, "However came it into so twisted a shape?" To this I could venture an explanation, if necessary; but the sagacity of most of my readers will, no doubt, be equal to it.

But it is more important—at least, for those who incline to regard the Bible as a great thesaurus of proof texts—to shew the real meaning of the verse. And to this end I must beg indulgence for a brief expository homily, which perhaps the readers of "LIGHT" may the more readily grant as constituting for them a little variety.

The first six verses of this chapter discuss but one subject, and have a connection which, though not obvious at first to a careless reader, is plain enough when shewn. They are a discourse on the duty of a generous beneficence, one of the little sermons of which the book consists, and one by no means wanting in richness and beauty. But its pearls to be fairly seen must be strung on their thread. And as the theme cannot fail to be as welcome a one to the truly "liberal" thinker as to the so-called "orthodox," and its consideration just now may be apposite to the season, and particularly to the wants, or rather the just claims, of our invaluable periodical itself through which I speak, may I not be pardoned for a few sentences of exposition?

The discourse reads in our version thus:—

1. Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.
2. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.

3. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.

4. He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap.

5. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all.

6. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

COMMENTARY.

The preacher was a man of experience, and knew well with whom he had to deal in this matter; that in it most men were slow to be persuaded. Accordingly he occupies himself largely with their common objections. Most men prefer to put their money where they think it will pay best; where they can see a good return coming in from it and speedily. So he begins by an appeal directly to their selfishness, as the only spring that could at first be touched, and bids them observe:—

(Verse 1.) That though seed grain, broadcast over inundated land, may seem to those who have never made the experiment like mere wastefulness, or, at best, to offer but an extremely uncertain promise of a harvest, yet it was after all the surest way to secure an ample return, and well known to be so. The very circumstance, indeed, that made it seem unpromising was the one that guaranteed a full reward. It might be slower in coming—"after many days"—than from a drier soil; but it would be all the surer and larger.

(Verse 2.) "Seven," one of the so-called "sacred numbers," stands obviously here, as elsewhere, for indefinitely, a great many, as when it was said of Israel's enemies, "They shall flee before thee seven ways," i.e., in all directions. "Eight" seems added for emphasis, as if to say, "You need not fear any excess in this line. The calls are many, no doubt, and keep coming continually. But be not weary of them; Give to him that asketh thee, though like the penitent offender he turn to thee for the seventh or seventy times the seventh time." And the reason urged for this generosity is, "You know not what calamities may yet overtake you, when either your ability to give may no longer be continued to you, or, worse still, you may become in your turn the needy sufferer, dependent on the charity of others." "Thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth."

(Verse 3.) Nor say that though you give little, you have as generous a heart as any. "If the clouds be full of water they empty themselves upon the earth," giving not meagrely, but to their exhaustion. Nor again say that you are not sure but that you might do more good in some other way. Quite possibly; but don't be over particular about this. If the tree falls in any direction, south or north, there it is, to be made useful. Your benefactions might possibly be better ordered in their fall; but let not this prevent their falling. They will be found, wherever they are, and put to use. Can anything else be meant?

(Verse 4.) Nor be too keen-eyed for every discouraging circumstance, looking in all directions for hindrances and reasons for delay. Time spent only in watching the wind and clouds will bring no harvest.

(Verse 5.) "But how is the reward of my beneficence ever to get to me?" says the objector. "They whom I help will probably never be able to help me; and, alas! as the world goes, too often would not if they could. The ways of Providence must be very mysterious that shall ever bring the widespread charities that you ask of me back in the blessings you promise." Yes, faltering sceptic, they are so; but "thou knowest not the works of God." The intricate web of His arrangements is too tangled a puzzle for you. Even the way in which your own body came into being you do not understand. Everywhere appear methods of His work which you cannot trace. The wisdom that framed and animated your complex and wonderful being can cause "all things to work together for good" to you, along lines every one of which is out of your sight.

(Verse 6.) Therefore excuse not yourself on any grounds from a generous beneficence in your youth, nor yet in your old age. Perhaps even the smaller sums which the former season enables you to bestow "shall prosper" as much to their end as the half-promised gifts of the latter; if not more widely in the world, at least in your own heart, saving you from a shrivelled soul that so often sits starving amid great abundance. You are sent into the field, not for the morning only, nor yet for the evening only, but for the day. Let the swift-approaching night but quicken your diligence, for the Master saith, "Behold, I come quickly; and My reward is with Me, to give to every man according as his work shall be."

Have I, in offering a critical correction, taken advantage of my opportunity to preach too long a sermon? And, moreover, to discuss a topic not belonging distinctively to Spiritualism? The truly large-hearted will readily forgive me. And Spiritualists who have learned to any purpose the great lessons of their faith will feel that, though the duty I have urged belongs, indeed, to all mankind, under every variety of creed, they of all men are the last who can consistently ignore it.

EXTRAORDINARY SPIRITUALISTIC REVELATIONS IN BLACKBURN.

Under this heading the Blackburn Standard, of the 27th ult., gives the following story without note or comment of any kind:—

"About six months ago a young woman, some fifteen or sixteen years of age, then living in Lansdowne-street, Witton, daughter of a Mrs. Rooney, a widow, began to attend the Spiritualist meetings held in the Science and Art School, Paradise-lane, Blackburn. She had attended several meetings before her mother found out the fact, but when she did she reprimanded her very severely for having missed her own school to attend such a place, and forbade her ever going again. However, the Sunday following found the girl at the forbidden meetings, and when she went home to tea Mrs. Rooney asked her daughter had she been to school, but her reply was, 'No, I have been to hear the Spiritualists.' Mrs. Rooney immediately made the girl put away her Sunday clothes in the drawer, and would not allow her to go out of the house again that day for having disobeyed her commands. The Sunday following the girl pleaded so much with her mother to allow her to go to the meeting in the afternoon that Mrs. Rooney wondered to herself 'Whatever can there be that attracts the girl so much that she has seemed to lose all interest in her own school? After a long pleading Mrs. Rooney said, 'Well now, I will let you go this time, but you must never ask me again.' When the girl went home to tea she told her mother what a good lecture she had listened to, and added, 'I am sure you would have liked it had you been there.' She then began to ask her mother to let her go at night, and urged, 'You might go with me and hear and see for yourself what sort of meetings they are.' Mrs. Rooney said, 'I will go and see for myself, and if I disapprove of the meetings you shall never go again.' So she prepared herself and they went together. After the address, several of her neighbours who attended the spiritualist meetings went to her and asked her how she liked the lecture. She replied, 'Better than I expected when I came here.' They then invited her to go with them, and told her they were going to hold a private meeting in the house of one of the friends. When they arrived at the house of the party they formed a circle and sat with their hands placed flat on the top of the kitchen table. In a little while the table began to move, and questions were asked which the table answered by spelling messages in a way that to the uninitiated would seem singular and strange. One of the party repeated the alphabet, and when the various letters were reached that formed the words the leg of the table lifted and knocked on the floor. Thus one message after another was given. After this an alphabet-card was laid on the table and two persons lightly held a thin stick between their fingers. In a little time the tip of the stick began to point to various letters and the messages spelled out, but much quicker than with the table. Mrs. Rooney sat and watched, but when the people told her that the messages were being given by spirits she shook her head sceptically, and when she went home she said to herself 'I will never believe the messages were given by spirits unless they will do the same for me when I am alone.' The following morning she determined to try if she could get a message, and as she got her living by washing clothes she set her boiler fire going and filled the boiler with water. While the water was heating she locked the door, pulled down the blind, so that no one could see through the window what she was doing, got her little table, and tried her first experiment in Spiritualism. Before giving the result of the experiment it would be as well to go back some twenty-five years in the history of Mrs. Rooney. At that time she was a young woman living with her parents when she made the acquaintance of a young man of whom her parents very much disapproved. The acquaintance ripened into courtship, and rather than give up her sweetheart she left home and got a situation as a servant in a gentleman's family. From the day she left home to the day she tried the experiment with the spirits she had never heard from any member of her family, and did not know whether they were living or dead; or if living, where they were. On sitting down at her table on the Monday morning mentioned, she heard a bell ringing, and thought there must be some one dead, and that the bell she heard must be the bell of St. Mark's Church. In a few minutes after her hands had been placed upon the table it began to move, and spelled in the same manner she had seen the night before, 'The joy-bells are ringing.' The next message was for her to procure an alphabet-card and stick, and messages would be given to her by those means. These she procured and proceeded as she had seen her friends the previous night. Shortly the stick began to move over the letters of the alphabet, and then began to point to the letters and figures composing the following words:—'Your brother John is alive, and lives at 28, East-street, Weymouth, write to him.' When her daughter came home from the mill she told her what she had been doing, and directed her to write to the above address and ask if John Hoskins lived there, as the writer was very much interested in knowing whether he did or not. She signed the letter 'A friend of the family.' In a few days she received a letter saying that John Hoskins did live at that address, and he wished to know who there was in Blackburn knew him and felt interested in his welfare. A second letter was then sent saying the writer of the letters was his sister Mary. On receipt of this, John immediately prepared to go to Blackburn and see his sister, and the result of the journey was that, although twenty-five years had elapsed since they separated, the moment he set eyes on Mrs. Rooney he recognised her as his long-lost sister. To make a long story short, Mr. Hoskins explained to her his circumstances, and how his affairs were financially, and said he would gladly take her and her daughter home with him, and provide for them, as his circumstances would allow him to do so. This offer Mrs. Rooney accepted, and Mr. Hoskins provided her with sufficient money to pay the travelling expenses of herself and daughter, as well as the carriage of her household furniture from Blackburn to Weymouth. Mrs. Rooney left Blackburn for her new home on the 5th December, 1884. The messages given to Mrs. Rooney purported to have been given by the spirits of her mother, who passed away about twelve years ago, and Tom Dunn, a young man she knew before she left home. Of course, when Mr. Hoskins was over in Blackburn he inquired from his sister how she got his address, and when she let him see the method by which she received it he was amazed, never having seen or heard anything of Spiritualism before."

THE Christian Register, an organ of the Unitarians of the United States, says, in a recent number:—"When tables, without contact with any persons, move; when music comes from a locked piano; when writings come without human agency, facts are presented which ought to be investigated. They have been too long left to the explanations of those who are incompetent to investigate. Many acknowledge the facts without accepting the explanation of them put forward by Spiritualists. We therefore welcome the proposition for establishing a society for investigating them upon purely scientific principles." This is pretty well for our Unitarian contemporary. A quarter of a century seems rather long for coming to a rational conclusion.

La Chaine Magnétique reports an exhibition of Stuart Cumberland's faculty of finding, blindfolded, small concealed objects, and of pointing out the seat of pain felt by any person with whom he is in contact. Cumberland says that he has had the faculty from his childhood, but has cultivated it. One condition of the successful use of it is, that the person who has concealed the object shall continuously and distinctly think of it, and where he has placed it, while Cumberland holds his hands. He says that the exercise of it is followed by fatigue of the brain and exhaustion of nerve-force. "Tous," says the Chaine Magnétique, "Cumberland passes, unconsciously, into a state of temporary spontaneous sleep-waking, when the mind cognises without the use of the external senses, as in the ordinary waking state."

MATERIALISATIONS AND TRANSFIGURATIONS.

In a celebrated letter of Mr. A. Russel Wallace to the Banner of Light on Materialisations—which was translated for the Revue Spirite of December, 1882, and from which I retranslate it now, not having the original—that "Prince of Science so universally known and respected," as the Revue so truly calls him, makes the following remarks:—

"With all these phenomena, two conditions determine the nature and the character of the manifestations. First, when the conditions are exceedingly favourable, forms may be produced apart from the medium. Secondly, when the conditions are less favourable, they can alone be produced by loosing the medium from his bonds. In this case the medium is transfigured; which is, in many instances, only one degree less marvellous than the other. Of this latter class I have seen a good number of examples with different mediums."

Now, if this be true, which few if any in the flesh now doubt, I would ask a simple question depending on it. Does anybody know of any one single control (who must know whether Professor Wallace's dicta are true or not), that has acknowledged this second proposition, or is likely to do so?—one, for instance (for there is almost, if not always, a talking control in the cabinet), who will boldly and honestly enunciate from his recess: "That, ladies and gentlemen, is the real thing, for you will shortly see the medium and myself together, which will prove it; yet it takes a good deal out of the medium, and we wish to spare him all we can. But this other condition, ladies and gentlemen, which has the advantage of not fatiguing the medium, and gives ourselves less trouble, is of the second class, but is, as the Professor acknowledges, only one degree less marvellous than the other, therefore we give it you to shew our powers, for we can transform our medium, making him short or tall, according to our devices; young or old, dark or fair, transfiguring every feature; and, wonder of all, giving the appearance even of a change of sex." Had the controls said this, since they can do it, they would have often saved the mediums much contumely, often quite undeserved on the medium's part, as well as warded off general dishonour to their cause, and by so doing would only have given evidence of that common-sense which they greatly lack.

As this candour in controls is most rare, if not unprecedented, I am brought to my point; and the fact remains that the control who has only once been proved to have brought out his medium in the second condition referred to by Mr. Wallace, under pretence that it was the first condition referred to by the Professor, has plainly forfeited his claim to be implicitly relied upon in any other respect. We hear a good deal from writers on materialisations of the medium being heard coughing or groaning in the cabinet while the forms are outside; but what proof have we that this coughing and groaning is not imitated by the talking-spirit in the cabinet? I mean, of course, if ever he has but once been proved to have perpetrated deception. This is a proof, I fear, that souls may sometimes rather lose moral sense on leaving earth than gain it; as well, indeed, as lose that craft and common-sense which we generally find among men here, even when the moral sense seems departed. But are we on this account to jump to the conclusion of one of your correspondents in your number of December 13th, who says: "I believe it is rare that departed souls communicate through mediums." I think not. Your correspondent imputes such communications to "irresponsible beings of a sub-human order." But, I would ask, where did these "irresponsible beings" get our alphabet, and how do these "sub-humans" learn to spell? Almost all we know about these beings is through their being able to spell just like ourselves. Now we all know that the three R's cannot be learnt in a day, and we find that these beings not only spell, write, and calculate, exactly like ourselves, but their modes of expression are the same, shewing plainly that they have been, at some time or other, in the same sort of schools and the same sort of society as we have ourselves; that in England they speak English, as a rule, and in France they speak French, and, for the matter of that, in China they speak Chinese. And where, too, do these "sub-humans," as sub-humans, gain knowledge, often so far above their superiors and questioners, if they be "sub-human"? How is it that many of these "sub-humans" who communicate habitually in English, write also well and grammatically in foreign languages, ancient and modern? Where did these go to school? Where do they learn these human accomplishments if they are not human themselves, or, if young when they die, learning them from fellow human beings in the other life? How is it that these our alleged "subs" understand so well our habits and customs? Will it be said that, as invisible sub-human beings, they learn to talk with us, learn to read with us, constantly keep our society, and know as much and generally more than we do, they knowing everything of us, and we knowing nothing of them? If so, then, how can they be our "subs"? But have invisible "subs" all these privileges? I doubt it. I had thought that the knowing of our down-sitting and uprising, the understanding of our thoughts afar off, the compassing our path and our lying down, and being acquainted with all our ways, were the attributes of a very high nature and not those of our "subs." And rather, is not the theory of sub-human communication with men as an explanation of Spiritualism, an anomaly, a paradox, and a sham?

DIRECT SPIRIT-WRITING.

Le Spiritisme (Paris) publishes the following letter:—

"Yesterday, being in London, a lady proposed that I should accompany her to 12, Old Quebec-street, the residence of a psychographic medium, named Eglinton. On our arrival we found that he was absent, but expected to return shortly. We waited. We found a lady there with the same object. She spoke French, and in conversation I found that, although a believer, she had been a little shaken in the thought that it was altogether right to inquire of spirits, by some conversation she had had recently with some one who had cited some passage of Scripture. I argued in favour of inquiry, and while doing so the medium came in. This terminated our discussion, and the lady sat down at the table with us. The table was a plain uncovered one, and the room was well lighted. The medium invited the lady to take in her hand a pair of slates in a folding frame, shutting together like a book, with lock and key. Between the slates he asked her to place a small piece of pencil, and then lock them together. We then all joined hands. The lady expressed a strong desire that she might have a communication from her mother, and immediately there came sounds of rapid writing; then three taps announced the cessation of the communication. On the slates being opened imagine our astonishment at seeing the whole interior of the slates filled with a long message, which, on reading, we found to be a commentary upon the conversation between the lady and myself before the medium came in, concluding with an exhortation to maintain an irreproachable life, and promising her happiness on her entering the world of spirits."

"When it came to my turn, I wrote, quite apart, upon one of the slates, that it would give me happiness if I could receive some message from my brother Jules. Closing the slates I placed them on my chair and sat upon them. I then joined hands with the rest, and immediately I heard sounds of writing. These ceasing I opened the slates, and found a long communication from my brother, recommending patience to me, and assuring me that he was happy in his new life.

"I could enlarge much upon the incidents of this séance, but limit myself to expressing my astonishment at a message being written in a few seconds, which would take a quarter of an hour for a mortal to write.

"No sceptic of a candid mind could resist conviction in the presence of such marvels.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

GLASGOW.—In view of the unfortunate circumstances in which one of the worthiest veterans in the spiritual cause, Mr. J. J. Morse, is at present placed, the appeal of Mrs. Maltby, as published in "LIGHT," was last Sunday brought forward for consideration at the forenoon séance of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists. It was then and there unanimously resolved that something be done. Accordingly a subscription list on behalf of Mr. Morse has been opened by Mr. James Robertson (president), and it is confidently anticipated a substantial sum will soon be collected. It was also agreed that the proceeds of the Society's séance on the following Tuesday should be applied to the same object. The feelings of Glasgow Spiritualists towards Mr. Morse are those of admiration and respect; it was therefore an easy task for Mr. Robertson, as chairman of the evening meeting, to quicken the sympathies of the Spiritualist portion of the audience for the worker, who has spent his energies in the cause "not wisely, but too well," so far as his own health is concerned. Last Sunday evening (28th ult.), the platform was occupied by Mrs. Wallis, the subject of her guides' discourse being: "The Gospel of Gloom v. The Gospel of Gladness." The deliverance was forcible, and, on the whole, well-sustained. It was argued that every form of teaching, or preaching, which exercised a fettering influence upon individual thought, judgment, and opinion, and which curtailed the outlook of struggling humanity into the future—limiting its horizon to the narrow radius of the physical life—was a gospel of gloom. In the same category were classed dogmatic Theology and Materialism, inasmuch as the influence which they respectively exerted upon human life, hope, and effort was paralysing and depressing. On the other hand it was claimed for Spiritualism that its special feature was the message of gladness and bright promise it conveyed, cheering the most those who needed most cheer, whilst it sustained all by the unlimited prospect of future growth, happiness, and blessed achievement it opened up for the toilers of the earth. Mrs. Wallis will also speak next Sunday, while her husband ministers to the Spiritualists of Newcastle and Shields.—ST. MUNGO.

NEWCASTLE.—Dr. Andrieu, of Amiens, delivered an address, in the French language, upon "Animal Magnetism," in the Central Hall, Hood-street, on Thursday, December 18th, before the members and friends of the Cercle Littéraire Français. He illustrated his lecture with experiments upon the well-known mesmeric sensitive, R. Nesbit, commonly called "Dick, the Pit Lad." These experiments were very successful, especially in view of the fact that the sensitive did not know a word of French, and that he and Dr. Andrieu had only met for the first time an hour or two previous to the lecture. Some of the experiments were performed without the utterance of a word or sound of any sort, and with the sensitive turned with his back to the operator, the proceedings eliciting applause from the very select audience assembled. M. Grand, president of the Cercle, presided.

STONEHOUSE.—The following course of lectures will be delivered through the mediumship of Mr. W. Burt, at the Sailors' Welcome Lecture Hall (opposite Siloam Chapel), Union-place, Stonehouse, on Sunday evenings at 7:—January 4th, subject: "The Death of Satan;" 11th, "The Cleansing of the Sanctuary;" 18th, "The First Resurrection;" 25th, "The Second Death." Services are also held in the above hall every Sunday morning at 11 a.m. and 3 p.m.

A LADY PROFESSOR.—Mrs. Pierce, of Sharpsville, some years ago gave 10,000dol. to the Buchtel College, Akron, Ohio, to institute a chair of English Literature, to be filled by a woman. It recently became vacant, and the trustees began to inquire for a male professor. This brought a protest from Mrs. Pierce. She said if there was no woman fitted for the post in America, one should be imported. It is now filled by a woman.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE Saratoga Eagle of November 22nd, says:—"If what are called spiritual phenomena are real, they afford corroboration of the Scriptural doctrine of a life beyond the grave. The scientific investigation of them, which has lately been proposed, is commended on all sides. The growing demand for demonstrable truth renders it probable that means for establishing a school for psychical investigation will soon be forthcoming."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Akakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents Thiers and Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HODGINS, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1887.

"M.A. (OXON)."

We are extremely sorry to be unable to report any favourable change in the condition of "M.A. (Oxon)." He is still confined to his bed, and suffers severely. We have received a few lines (through an amanuensis), in which he informs us that the shock to his system has been even greater than was imagined by the physicians, and that work of any kind will be impossible till Easter at any rate. The following article was forwarded to us with the intention that it should be used as the first instalment of a new series of "Notes by the Way." This plan, the writer, by his renewed ill-health, has been forced to abandon; and we can only, in the circumstances, announce the fact with the profoundest regret and sympathy, at the same time hoping that a speedy change will occur with the result of a complete and permanent restoration to health and strength.

SPIRITUALISM AND AGNOSTICISM.

By "M.A. (OXON)."

Mr. Chainey's apology for his new faith, elicited by a letter from Colonel Ingersoll, is diffuse and somewhat emotional. Perhaps it is to be expected that a man who has passed from the rigid pietism of the Methodist to the comparative liberty of Unitarianism, and thence to the condition of the Secularist who is "a law unto himself," and who has found that state of things hollow and unsatisfying, should metaphorically "prance" somewhat as a Spiritualist. No doubt Mr. Chainey does exult in his larger liberty, but he has a right to do that, if only he "has the root of the matter in him," as he would once have said. I trust with all sincerity that the influence brought to bear on Mr. Chainey may be as permanent as it seems now to be potent. It is noteworthy that about the same time that Mr. Chainey was finding his goal in Spiritualism, another well-known man, starting also from Methodism, was making public confession of Agnosticism. Mr. Moncreux Conway, so long minister of South-place Chapel, is now in evidence as one who finds no rest for himself in the Methodism, Unitarianism, or Theism, which he has tried. His state of mind, as portrayed by himself, is instructive.

After a ministry of twenty-one years, Mr. Moncreux Conway abandons the attempt to find for himself a creed that he can continue to teach to others for any appreciable time. Theology has become to him dry as dust, fair-seeming, but rotten at the core. He started in his 'teens as a Methodist, and was pulled up short because he too graphically translated the Bible narratives in terms of modern thought. Then he became Unitarian, and passed through that rather colourless form of belief into a still more colourless Theism. Finally he takes refuge in the negations of Agnosticism, and may fairly be said to have made a phenomenally rapid progress from the domain of a too vivid faith to the quicksands of hypothetical negation, on which he now finds himself temporarily stranded. During these twenty-one years many minds have passed under his influence, and have passed out of it again. The marvel has been why one so able, so earnest, in many ways so gifted, did not retain his grasp on those who drifted within his reach. The reason now is clear. He himself had no firm foot-hold whence he could reach out a helping hand to those who sought his aid. The seven discourses in this volume* are most of them remarkable; and from them might easily be picked sentiments that have the ring of truth, and all the freshness and vividness of thought struck off red-hot from a deeply-stirred mind. He has broken with conventional Religion; "the soul of Theology is hatred," and he flings it from him with abundant disgust. He sees all around him the decay of Faith; his eye is keen to discern the signs of the times, but he is far less at home when asked to leave the realm of destructive, almost pessimistic criticism, and to find a remedy for the evils he deplures.

It would be at once ungenerous and unfair not to admit that there is much in Mr. Conway's farewell discourses that is full of insight and of hope. But in turning his back on the past he has transferred his faith to the misty and distant future. He still believes (apparently without much reason) that all will come right in the end. He rightly discerns that the religious world is passing through a crisis: that the old Faith has lost much of its hold on the thinking world; but he does not discern in what way its truths can be restated so as to meet the wants of a scientific age in such sort as the old truths of Judaism were restated by the Christ to meet the wants of the age in which He lived. He is impatient of attempts to meet the great want, if they do not chance to fit in with his present mood. "The great change," he says, "that has come over Christendom is due to the decay of faith in Heaven at a moment when the struggle for existence makes earth a hell for millions. It is not a question of immortality. Our theologians seem to think they are saving men from despair when they shew anthropological possibilities that individual consciousness survives death. They are grievously mistaken. . . . Abstract Theism cannot bring comfort and hope to mankind. Why should a man who under God is born in the slums of London suppose that under God he might not be born again in the slums of some other planet?" Anthropological possibilities, forsooth! Spiritualism, if he could only have made up his mind to master its far-reaching revelation of the possibilities of the future, would have solved for him his enigma. It would have illuminated his difficulty by teaching him, what I should have thought so acute and penetrating a mind might have found out for itself, at any rate as a possibility, viz., that the acts and habits of our life here build up a character which is perpetuated hereafter; that man is now occupied in preparing his future dwelling-place, and that the question of slum or no slum is not one of chance, but of the slow, imperceptible building up of character by the daily sum of his own self-chosen acts. Hereafter the righteous is righteous still, as the filthy is filthy still, because the change called death makes no break in the continuity of existence. The life that now is determines the life that is to come.

Mr. Conway is the only person of whom I have ever heard it stated that he had tried to investigate honestly and sufficiently the evidence that Spiritualism gives of perpetuated life after death, without in any way becoming satisfied that it offers real and worthy matter for investigation. I have in my mind a letter of his to the Spectator some years ago, which very curtly stated, if I am not mistaken, a rougher conclusion than that which I have formulated for him. And yet, as these discourses abundantly shew, there is no man who would have been saved from himself; from the groanings of a mind that has found all things theological but vanity and vexation of spirit; from an abyssal pessimism which is relieved only by a pathetic trust in the people and their democratic reign—there is no man who has so put himself in evidence as in need of the leavening influence of that belief which Spiritualism propounds as Mr. Conway does in these discourses. With his intense appreciation of the widening of educated sympathy with various forms of faith who will not agree? "Human religion," he says, "is yet in its infancy: perhaps there are visions to come later; but even now we are realising a new world around us, long overshadowed by our star-gazing neglect. From their hiding-places new bibles are coming, scriptures of every race and age, and the great oratorio of humanity swells through them for the first time. Our canon is vastly enlarged and enriched. Heroes and sages come from their graves; we are no longer bound to think of half the heroes and sages of our race as pagans burning in hell; we lovingly walk with Zoroaster beside the Euphrates; we listen to Buddha beside the Bo trees; we gather with the youth of Athens to listen to Socrates and Plato; and Jesus, who for fifteen centuries was taken from us by theology . . . has come forth to our fearless research, with all the sweetness and love that melted the heart of Mary, and all the eloquence that charmed men from their idols." Who can resist the charm of that picture? Our horizon is wider, our views are truer and more charitable, and while we venerate our Master as the veritable incarnation of what to us is the Divinest ideal, we can spare a glance of admiration for those adumbrations of the Divine who, in other lands, to other peoples, in ages other than our own, have revealed to their followers glimpses of God's own Truth.

Who again can fail to admire the insight that characterises such a passage as this? "In youth I pondered over these words of a Christian seer, 'I saw a new heaven and a new earth,' and they revealed to me that a new heaven of ideals must always be followed by a reformed earth. But now, to my further age, they reveal that equally a new earth leads on to a new heaven. The old heaven having faded—its rosy bowers, and harps, and thrones broken into drifting clouds—leaving immortality a cold Perhaps, a possibility not altogether pleasing to the weary toilers of earth, I am convinced that if faith in Paradise is recovered it will be from the standpoint of a happier earth. The ancient heaven shone by contrast with earthly despair: the new heaven will reflect the glories of a renovated world." And what Spiritualist will not see that that "cold Perhaps" which chills Mr. Conway's loftiest aspirations, and paralyses his best endeavours, is just what Spiritualism, and nothing else, unless it be a personal revelation, can remove. I am using my words in a large sense, as I am entitled. I do not pretend that any amount of what Mr. Conway probably understands by Spiritualism—rapping tables, floating chairs, mysterious writings, or phenomena that are the unfailing annuity of Maskelyne and Cook, Stuart Cumberland, Irving Bishop et hoc genus omne—would do anything but breed disgust in a mind which has a large capacity for a sort of superfine scorn. But if he could overcome that unlovely tendency, there is, I stoutly maintain, that to be had from Spiritualism which would prove a balm to his wounded spirit.

Man makes his own future, is the arbiter of his own destiny, fabricates for himself now the surroundings amid which he must dwell hereafter. His life here is not, as Mr. Conway says in his haste, an affair of chance. Born in the New Cut now, amid an environment that makes progress apparently impossible, and virtue, culture, even decency, unattainable ideals—to be born, perhaps, in some equivalent slum in some more debased and degraded life on a lower planet hereafter! No, not if the life be lived at its best, even though it be to outward seeming all unlovely and vicious. Progress is the law, and its operation is not to be measured by casual glimpses of this fragment of existence; nor is its development to be judged by the superficial signs that alone are open to man's judgment. But I must not go further. I have not found for a long time so much thought-provoking material as is contained in the seven discourses, for which I beg to thank Mr. Conway.

THE SWEDENBORGIAN CHURCH AND THE PARIS PRESS.

A Swedenborgian Church has been opened in Paris. The event has exercised the minds of our gentlemen of the Press; with the Catholic clerical part of it, of course, it finds no favour. As their Church makes the pretension of being the sole depositary of all truth, its Press seems to feel bound to treat the Church of the "New Jerusalem" with disdain.

Our Republican journals, who make a boast of being "free-thinkers," show no toleration for such an outgrowth of freedom of inquiry; as they do not, indeed, for any other unless it be in their own direction. For instance—the Presse, in reference to it, says, "Now, we have one more added to the petty chapels and coteries where, in spite of science and free-thought, mystical practices, borrowed from the vagaries of the past, are to be inculcated." The Evenement says, "At a time when all religions are losing their adherents an attempt is made to establish a fresh sect among us. The futility of trying to propagate the Swedish philosopher's doctrines is as palpable as the obscurity enshrouding them—an obscurity baffling to the most resolute examination." The Petit Parisien says, "Paris can now point to a new church; surely there were already temples enough in France raised to superstition, and another was scarcely wanted for helping to obscure reason!"

We, however, watch with fraternal interest this movement of the Swedenborgians. It is not their first attempt to establish a church in France. Thirty years ago they had one at Saint Armand, at the head of which was the sous-préfet of the place, Le Boys des Guays, a man of probity and learning, one of the translators of Swedenborg's works, and who thus helped French thinkers to get at the beauties as well as the obscurities of the remarkable Swede.

Honoré de Balzac, in his Séraphita, condensed, as well as he could do in a few pages, the Swedenborgian philosophy. This, so far as concerns terrestrial things, consists in condemning self-seeking and inculcating charity; and as concerns things celestial, while bearing the stamp of the marvellous, it certainly does not admit—as one of his critics insists—of being regarded as only adapted to visionaries and such as are prone to blind belief in the supernatural.

In all criticism, upon any subject, we should hold to the rule of suspending judgment until we have got at the knowledge of the facts of the case and their rational relations, and until we are able to consider it without prejudice. This rule, however, is generally disregarded by our contemporary Press; hence, necessarily, misrepresentations of Swedenborg now, and of the spiritual philosophy always.

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

Dr. Wyld's interesting record supplies a circumstance of evidence the absence of which somewhat invalidated a similar experience of my own many years ago. On this account I have never yet published it; and if I give the facts now it is rather to shew how exacting of evidence have been some of us convinced investigators, whose competence is disparaged for no better reason, as far as I can make out, than that we have arrived at an affirmative conclusion.

It was at one of Mr. Herne's public dark séances, at 15, Southampton-row, that the phenomenon occurred. We took our seats and joined hands before the gas was put out. I was third from the medium on his left; a non-professional medium, a Mr. C., with whom I had but a very slight acquaintance, was on my left. There were two iron rings on the table before us, the diameter of the one hereinafter mentioned (and which I still have) being nearly seven inches. When the light was extinguished there was no ring visible on either arm of my left neighbour, Mr. C., and his right hand was clasped in my left. After sitting for some time with feeble results, I became myself dissatisfied, for some reason, not suggested by anyone else, with the order in which we sat, and myself proposed that Mr. C. should change places with me so as to be on my right instead of on my left. (I believe I thought that this nearer approach of the non-professional to the professional medium would be favourable, though they would still be separated by two sitters.) The change—the only one—was effected in the dark, my right hand now holding Mr. C.'s left. The manifestations increasing in force, I asked for the "ring test." Shortly after, I heard one of the rings taken up and struck, as it seemed, and as Mr. C. said, against the wrist of his left hand—the one secured in my own right. He winced, and almost at once the ring slipped over our two hands on to my fore-arm. A light was struck, and there it was found, without our hands having been once disjoined since the change of seats. Mr. C. allowed me to measure his coat-sleeve to exclude the possibility that a ring similar to those on the table had been on his arm beneath the coat; and I found (as may easily be supposed from the above given diameter of the ring) that this was not possible. I believed, and still believe, that it was a genuine phenomenon, and I brought away the ring to have the apparently solid circumference of the iron tested by an expert, taking care not once to let the ring, taken off my arm, out of my hand, that no change might possibly be effected. But unhappily the evidential value of the case was impaired by the change of seats in the dark. True, the suggestion of this came from myself, and Mr. C.'s character was, so far as I was aware, unblemished. But at that stage of my investigations, I always presumed against character, and if the idea of a trick had occurred to him, he had the opportunity, during the few seconds of the change of seats, to snatch up one of the rings and slip it up his arm. He shewed me a slight scar on his wrist, but that, of course, counted for nothing with me as evidence.

Dr. Wyld took the precaution of passing his hand up the medium's arm just before the phenomenon occurred, a precaution which, unfortunately, did not occur to me. I should otherwise have thought my evidence complete, and I see no flaw in Dr. Wyld's.

C. C. M.

The occurrence described by Dr. Wyld in your issue of January 3rd would be so interesting, if genuine, that many of your readers will probably share my regret that the conditions were not more completely unexceptionable. The account, as it stands, is far from conclusive. To begin with, Dr. Wyld tells us that he has been in the habit of carrying about his ring for purposes of experiment, but does not tell us that he has invariably preserved it from examination. One would be glad to know how he has assured himself that his private marks have not been detected and imitated. Assuming, however, that the ring which finally appeared on the medium's wrist was really Dr. Wyld's marked ring, everything depends on knowing (1) the history of the ring and (2) the condition of the medium's arm, during the moments or minutes that preceded the alleged transference of the one to the other.

As regards the first point, Dr. Wyld says that before the transference took place, and while his right hand was clasping the medium's left hand in the dark, a ring was put into his own left hand (by "Irresistible," according to him, but he does not tell us how he knew this), and was then withdrawn. "I was satisfied it was my own ring from its oval form, its size, and its thickness." Dr. Wyld can hardly expect others to be satisfied that the ring felt by him was a particular ring, on the ground of its possessing characteristics which might belong to any number of rings. If the conditions of previous séances at all resembled the conditions on this occasion, his ring has been en évidence again and again, and its size and shape were no secret. Since, therefore, we have no proof that this ring which he held for a moment before the alleged marvellous occurrence took place was his own marked ring which afterwards appeared on the medium's wrist, it becomes essential to know what length of time had elapsed since he had observed that marked ring under circumstances which left no doubt of its identity; and what opportunities had during that time existed for some one else to obtain possession of it. The impression is certainly conveyed that such opportunities existed in abundance; for not only had the ring passed out of Dr. Wyld's keeping, but the room was dark.

As regards the second point, the condition of the medium's arm immediately before the ring appeared on it, Dr. Wyld's evidence is more satisfactory. With his disengaged hand he made an exploration of the arm and wrist, and was convinced that no ring was there. But it would be very desirable to know what was the extent of his exploration—whether, for instance, he explored the nude arm as far up as the elbow. And considering the ease with which a conjurer can deceive the unwary as to which of his two hands they are holding, one would be glad to know that Dr. Wyld made sure throughout that it was the medium's left hand which he held. Moreover, it is impossible, in such a matter, to place complete reliance on the report of a single sense of a single person. In these obscure subjects, the first rule of scientific investigation is to obtain as much corroborative testimony as possible; and where the condition of darkness, as here, excludes any other mode of testing than that of touch, it is doubly important that one person's sensations should be confirmed by those of others. Some of Dr. Wyld's friends might surely have shared in the preliminary investigation of the arm. If the experiment is ever repeated, perhaps he will bear in mind this simple means of improving the quality of the evidence.

One further criticism may be made. Dr. Wyld lays stress on certain measurements whereby he thinks he proved that the ring was too small to be passed over the medium's hand. But as there undoubtedly are persons who can get their hands through what look like impossible apertures, and as the degree in which this power is possessed cannot be ascertained except with the bona fide assistance of the person to be tested, the test is one which can never have any real value, and the mention of it rather weakens than strengthens the case.

FLATLAND: A ROMANCE OF MANY DIMENSIONS. By A SQUARE. Price 2s. 6d. Seeley and Co.; or may be had direct from the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane.)

This is a capital satire, but it is also much more than that. In a humorous and dramatic form it is a really able attempt to make people understand the relativity of sense-consciousness, and its space conditions. Whether the author is scientifically successful in describing the optical and tactual possibilities of Flatland—a world in which our third dimension, height, is unknown—is a question we must leave to be answered by more competent critics. There being only one plane, the inhabitants have, of course, no conception of a solid in our sense, and are themselves distinguished by superficial configurations. These determine their rank and culture; evolution—which is the attainment of greater structural complexity—advancing regularly with every successive generation. The social and political constitution is thus dependent on biological facts, and the results are worked out with much ingenuity and in a very amusing fashion. It is shown that in a two-dimensional world the most different figures must all appear to the uneducated sense of sight as straight lines; a very dangerous state of things in the presence of angles which, by a dubious assumption, are credited with the power of transfixing superficial outlines. The women of Flatland being all actual straight lines are especially to be dreaded on this account. For, by turning to you one of their extremities, they become as invisible as mere points, and can run you through before you are otherwise aware of their presence. The common folk, who are for the most part isosceles triangles, can only discriminate by the senses of hearing and touch; but the highly educated classes are familiar with the science and art of Sight Recognition, which confers on them immense advantages. This, like most of our own visual discriminations, is the result of acquired judgments, but is dependent on geometrical attainments of a high order. Not to dwell upon this or other scientific peculiarities of Flatland, the following specimen of its difficulties in regard to the origin of light (the sun being, of course, not visible) is worth quoting. "It was in old days, with our learned men, an interesting and oft investigated question: What is the origin of light? and the solution of it has been repeatedly attempted, with no other result than to crowd our lunatic asylums with the would-be solvers. Hence, after fruitless attempts to suppress such investigations indirectly by making them liable to a heavy tax, the Legislature, in comparatively recent times, absolutely prohibited them. I, alas, I alone in Flatland know now only too well the true solution of this mysterious problem, but my knowledge cannot be made intelligible to a single one of my countrymen; and I am mocked at—I, the sole possessor of the truths of space and of the theory of the introduction of Light into the world of Three Dimensions—as if I were the maddest of the mad!"

We are perhaps not wrong in taking this as a hint that such mysteries as gravity and magnetic attraction might find their solution in a four-dimensional experience; that we, too, are in a world of effects whose causes do not belong to nature in our phenomenal sense; such effects being just the most important and all-pervading.

The politics of Flatland need not detain us, and though the satirical applications lie tolerably "on the surface," the best of the book is certainly the Second Part—"Other Worlds,"—wherein the mystical experiences—from the two-dimensional point of view—of the "Square" author have full significance for ourselves.

As the hypothesis of a two-dimensional world to us, so, naturally, would be that of only one dimension to the dwellers of the surface. Accordingly, the first intromission into other worlds is in "A Vision of Lineland." He addresses a small line—which, of course, he takes to be a woman—and gets at first no answer. It is in fact the King. "It seemed that this poor ignorant monarch was persuaded that the straight line which he called his kingdom, and in which he passed his existence, constituted the whole of the world, and indeed the whole of Space. Not being able to move or to see, save in the Straight Line, he had no conception of anything out of it. Though he had heard my voice when I first addressed him, the sounds had come to him in a manner so contrary to his experience that he had made no answer, 'seeing no man,' as he expressed it, 'and hearing a voice as it were from my own intestines.' Until the moment when I placed my mouth in his World, he had neither seen me nor heard anything except confused sounds, beating against what I called his side, but what he called his inside or stomach, nor had he even now the least conception of the region from which I had come. Outside his World, or Line, all was a blank to him; nay, not even a blank, for a blank implies space; say rather, all was non-existent." To know how life and its essential relations can be carried on in a Straight Line, the conversation with the King of Lineland must be read. That his Majesty soon inferred the intruder to be a madman, from his use of expressions implying more than one dimension, will be readily conceived. For the Linelander, the line is the solid, and only the point is visible. So the King replies to the Flatlander, who has spoken of seeing the lines (men)—"But I deny that you saw these things, for how could you see the line, that is to say, the inside of any man? But you must have heard these things and then dreamed that you saw them. And let me ask what you mean by those words 'left' and 'right?'" After vain attempts at explanation, the Square attempts an ocular demonstration by moving himself out of the line, with, of course, no other result than that of becoming suddenly invisible as soon as the whole square was out of the line. When he returned and claimed the admission that there were other lines in Space, the King replied: "If you were a man of sense—if you had a particle of sense, you would listen to reason. You ask me to believe that there is another line besides that which my senses indicate, and another motion besides that of which I am daily conscious. I, in return, ask you to describe in words or indicate by motion that other line of which you speak. Instead of moving, you merely exercise some magic art of vanishing and returning to sight; and instead of any lucid description of your new World, you simply tell me the number and sizes of some forty of my retinue, facts known to any child in my capital. Can anything be more irrational or audacious?"

But now the tables were to be turned. We had already heard of the Square's grandson, the "promising young Hexagon of unusual brilliancy and perfect angularity." It would not be fair to quote the best bits of the book, which must be read to know how this precocious young mystic deduces an obscure intimation of the third dimension by applying the cube power of numbers to geometry; how he pursues the illustrations of his teachers to consequences altogether unheard of; and how he gets sent to bed for his pertinacity. But it was the last night of the old, and the eve of the new, millennium in Flatland, and as the sand of the hour glass ran out, a new revelation was vouchsafed to the Square, just as he was expressing impatience at his little grandson's folly. He is reproved by a being from the Three-Dimensional World, whose introduction on the scene, and the conversation and incidents which ensue, form the best possible introduction to Zollner's suggestive speculations. And seldom has serious instruction been conveyed in a lighter or more amusing guise. For the difficulties of the Flatlander in regard to his guest are just those of the Lineland monarch as regards the former; and again, they are just our own in relation to the denizens of a fourth dimension. In vain, however, does the strange guest recall to the Square his past experience in Lineland; the application cannot be intellectually made. In vain, also, does the Three-Dimensional being appear and disappear at will for the conviction of the Square, who "was now inclining to the belief that he must be no circle" (as which, of course, he necessarily appeared in Flatland, and so was taken for one of their highest aristocracy) "but some extremely clever juggler; or else that the old wives' tales were true, and that, after all, there were such people as Enchanters and Magicians." Then a mathematical demonstration is attempted by the analogical method; but all to no purpose except the exasperation of baffled intelligence degenerating into fierce intolerance. At length, all other resources of demonstration having failed, the Sphere forces the Square himself into three-dimensional space, and then the irony of the satire takes a new start. Among the preliminary proofs afforded of the third dimension had been the ability to see inside (over) the surface lines enclosing spaces which, for Flatland, were solids and invisible. But no sooner has the Square recovered from the first impressions of "Space"-land, then he puts to his guide a very natural question. He can now see what before was to him the "inside" of the Sphere—the line of depth—but he wonders that this power still does not reveal the "interior" organs—heart, lungs, &c., and he asks the reason. But the Sphere is not a Kantian philosopher, and like his querist, and like the King of Lineland, he forthwith confounds the possibilities of his own sense with the possibilities of sense in general. Although able himself to see the intestines of Flatlanders, he rejects as the highest absurdity the notion of four-dimensional beings who can see his own. Seldom has more

A Record of Mesmeric Facts and Philosophy.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I see by your advertising columns that there has been published a new edition of the most valuable popular work on Mesmerism that has been issued from the English press. As a student of mesmerism of fifty years' standing and having read during the last half century nearly all the standard works written on the subject, I wish, without disparaging the excellent works by Townshend, Baird, Elliotson, Braid, Halleck, Dods, and scores of others, to confidently recommend "Dr. Gregory's Letters to a Candid Inquirer," as the best popular work to put into the hands of an honest searcher after truth in the occult field of Mesmeric Phenomena.—I am, sir, yours truly, Scientific and Society Papers.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have forwarded the following communication to the editor of Knowledge for insertion in that paper:—

"I note the following extraordinary, and, I think, imprudent, paragraph in your 'Short Answers' of January 2nd: 'Fit only for the unfortunate creatures whose fatuous folly prompts them to believe in so gross an imposition as that of slate-writing.' I fear this has been written from the standpoint of prejudice rather than from that of investigation.

"You are, of course, aware that scores of credible and ordinarily competent witnesses have vouched for the genuineness of slate-writing phenomena, and I have seen it myself in the presence of a boy-psychic, under such conditions as to render imposition impossible, and I regret exceedingly that you do not take an opportunity of investigating the phenomena before expressing opinions so dogmatic, offensive, and untrue.—I am, &c."

The editor of one of the society papers, the name of which I shall not condescend to quote, is quite beyond the pale of public rejoinder, but even if he could so far control his prejudices as to examine the phenomena, he would per force be convinced of their reality and genuineness, and probably, but of that I am not certain, refrain from the virulent abuse of those whose knowledge extends far beyond his limited range.—I am, &c.,

Newcastle-on-Tyne, January 6th, 1885. T. P. BARKAS.

Testimonial to Mr. J. J. Morse.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Kindly permit me once more to draw the attention of your readers to the testimonial that is being raised to Mr. J. J. Morse. The presentation will take place on Wednesday next, and I would respectfully urge upon all friends who intend aiding in this work, to forward their subscriptions at once.

Upon the numerous friends of Mr. Morse in the provinces this appeal is more earnestly urged; as, apart from those who have so generously responded, there are many whose mite would shew him that he has still a place in the memory of those amongst whom he has so devotedly laboured. I have received further donations as follows: "A Friend," per Mr. Younger, £10; Glasgow Friends, per Mr. Robertson, £5; F.S.S., £5.—Yours very truly,

Miss Corner's Mission.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly notify in "LIGHT," that my Dinners for the Poor Children of Spitalfields and Bethnal Green will commence on January 7th, 12.15 p.m., at the Memorial Hall, Bethnal Green, and will continue every Wednesday and Friday throughout the months of January and February?—Yours truly, fun been got out of a serious argument than in this dialogue between the Square and the Sphere, the former at length pressing his opponent with a question shewing the latent reference throughout the book to occult phenomena.

"Is it, or is it not, the fact that ere now your countrymen also have witnessed the descent of beings of a higher order than your own, entering closed rooms, even as your lordship entered mine, without the opening of doors or windows, and appearing and vanishing at will? On the reply to this question I am ready to stake everything. Deny it, and I am henceforth silent. Only vouchsafe an answer."

"Sphere (after a pause): It is reported so. But men are divided in opinion as to the facts. And even granting the facts, they explain them in different ways."

To the Square's further question: "Those who have thus appeared—no one knows whence; and have returned—no one knows whither; have they also contracted their sections and vanished into that more Spacious Space, whither I now entreat you to conduct me?"

"Sphere (moodily): They have vanished certainly—if they ever appeared. But most people say that these visitors arose from the thoughts—you will not understand me—from the brain; from the perturbed angularity of the seer."

The eloquent protest of the Square against this view, and his enthusiastic presence of not only four-dimensional but a dimensional worlds, lead to his dismissal to his own Flatland, where the Parliament is busy in passing an Act something like ours of George the Second, for the suppression of pretensions to "revelations from another world." The methods of Materialism towards unacceptable facts, and the "conspiracy of silence," are not unfairly caricatured. The prudence of the poor Square is not long proof against the impulse to impart his knowledge, and intolerance inflicts upon him a life-long imprisonment. By a true psychological touch the worst of his martyrdom consists in the doubts which arise in his own mind as the impressions of his experience fade.

And the book contains higher lessons than even those of a new geometry. In Flatland, Understanding is exclusively esteemed, whereas "many of the best and wisest in Spaceland think more of the affections than of the understanding, more of your despised Straight Lines (women) than of your belauded circles." And we are left to infer that in yet larger conditions of Space-Life wisdom is yet more manifestly, as Swedenborg says, the "form of love." But the Square is warned against an undue moral estimate of the denizens—to him the "Spirits"—of the third dimension, merely on the ground of their "omniscience." A more profound lesson is suggested by a glimpse into Pointland, where the Point "is his own World, his own Universe"—the apotheosis of Individualism.

It may be noticed that this satire is said to have been anticipated by a more serious treatise on the same subject from the pen of Mr. Howard Hinton, a son of the celebrated James Hinton.

THE IDYLL OF THE WHITE LOTUS. By M.C., Fellow of the Theosophical Society. Price 5s. (London: Reeves and Turner, or may be obtained of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.)

The initials M.C. very thinly veil the identity of the author of this charmingly written book. Unless we are much mistaken "M.C." has no mean reputation in the world of fiction. But "The Idyll of the White Lotus" is much more than a mere story, though the author has adopted this method of conveying to the world the truths it is sought to enforce. In the preface it is described as "a story which has been told in all ages and among all peoples—the tragedy of the Soul. Attracted by Desire, the ruling element in the lower nature of man, it stoops to sin; brought to itself by suffering, it turns for help to the redeeming spirit within; and in the final sacrifice achieves its apotheosis and sheds a blessing on mankind." This so aptly describes the "argument" of the book that we feel a fitter introduction to our readers could not be found. Nor can we, in the space at our disposal, do more than express our conviction that no reader of "LIGHT" will regret having spent the time necessary for its perusal. We cordially commend it to attention.

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM? AN ANSWER TO THE GREAT QUESTION OF THE DAY. Price Sixpence. (London: E. W. Allen, or may be obtained of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.)

This pamphlet, by a lady of rank and title, is a fervid response to the question on Christian grounds; a valuable sustainer of Bible teaching, and a strong helper of those who uphold Christianity as opposed to Materialism and Infidelity, at a time when both are rampant.

THE UNSCIENTIFIC ATTITUDE OF SCIENTISTS.

Scientific men, as a party, have, since the great outburst of what have been termed spiritual manifestations, displayed unreasoning antagonism towards their investigation. This may have arisen from various causes, the primary reason being that the majority of those who have become convinced of the reality of the phenomena, have, at the same time, hastily arrived at the conclusion that all the phenomena are the production of beings who have passed from this life. The facts are startling and, apparently, sufficiently abnormal to cause any scientific mind, trained to recognise the correlation of physical forces, and conscious of the universal reign of law, to cry halt at their first presentation. Abnormal or unexpected phenomena, when disassociated from crude spiritual and future-life theories, are sufficient of themselves to arouse the suspicion, and too frequently the unreasoning antagonism of men of science. We have instances of this antagonism in the opposition and bitter animosity which, early in the present century, were caused by the promulgation of the ordinary phenomena of mesmerism, even after men of the reputation of Dr. Gregory, Rev. Chauncey Townsend, Dr. Elliotson, and scores of other able and highly reputed scientific and literary men, had, in the clearest possible manner, demonstrated their genuineness.

The theory of evolution had the same hard fight for recognition. The works of Monbodo, Erasmus Darwin, Goethe, Lamarck, the author of "Vestiges," and Charles Darwin, were but little read and less accepted till Huxley with his genius for popular exposition on the one hand, and Haeckel, with his painstaking, minute scientific researches on the other, struck down the barriers of conservative prejudice, and now the fear is that all may unreasonably be swept into the whirlpool of universal evolution.

Scientific men may be reminded that all investigators are not "fools and dolts;" that many of the most trained, cautious, and conscientious scientists, and hundreds of the shrewdest "men of the world," have examined these phenomena, and the remarkable fact is that all who have fully examined them have been convinced of their reality and genuineness; but there is far from a consensus of opinion as regards the mode in which they be best accounted for; some, like Serjeant Cox, believing that they are purely mundane, and the products of occult natural laws; while many others, such as Professor Wallace, believe that in them we have evidence of action by beings who have passed the portals of the tomb, and are living inhabitants of a spiritual sphere.

Laying aside for the present all theories, and approaching the investigation of the subject as scientific men approach the phenomena of electricity, and the laws of planetary motion, why should not earnest scientific inquirers, without prejudice and without predecision, inquire seriously into these occult phenomena?

Men of science know from experience that the seeming and the real are often in direct antagonism to each other. They know that obscure phenomena cannot be solved at a glance, but require days and often years of painstaking scientific research, at the end of which, by a process of "trial and error," truth is reached. Illustrations of this fact we have in the researches of Tyndall into the origin of monad life; in the experiments of Pasteur in the transmission and prevention of disease; and in the investigations of Dallenger into the life-history of Bacterium termo.

Let the same principles be applied to the investigation of what are termed psychic phenomena; let not scientists approach them as though they were infallible, and entered upon the investigation to discover deception, not to ascertain truth. Men of equal natural ability, and with higher scientific training, have investigated and assured themselves of their genuineness; surely a reasonable modesty should guide raw investigators. The error into which conceited investigators, utterly ignorant of the delicacy of the investigation, often stumble, is that of dictating terms and conditions of absurd kinds, instead of witnessing the phenomena under the conditions in which they can be produced, when careful observation will shew that the conditions are crucial, and much superior to those which seiolists in their ignorance wish to enforce.

Possibly the most satisfactory, conclusive, and easily-obtained form of occult psychical manifestation is that known as slate-writing, and we are confident, from long experience, that if that form of investigation be entered upon without offensive dogmatism and assurance, in the majority of cases the phenomena obtained will be of a kind to render the common theories of trick and legerdemain utterly and manifestly untenable.

Why should men of science longer delay in their investigation into these strange and well-accredited phenomena? Is it want of intellectual eagerness to discover truth, or is it scientific Mrs. Grundyism?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Several communications stand over till next week, amongst which may be named letters from "Ebor," W. R. T., W. Oxley, &c.

DR. GREGORY is the best definer in his "Animal Magnetism," of that department of it called electro-biology; and M. Donato is one of the best exponents of it under the name of Fascination, on the Continent. He has just concluded a series of lectures, with experiments upon willing subjects from his audiences, at Antwerp. L'Opinion reports that at his last lecture he was presented by a committee of the audience with a floral offering and an address, accompanied by an earnest invitation to repeat his visit next year.

Mr. W. Eglinton has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, in reply to Mr. Stuart Cumberland's "challenge" which appeared a few days since.

To the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.

SIR,—It is my pleasure to be a constant reader of the Pall Mall Gazette, and consequently I saw Mr. Cumberland's letter which recently appeared in your journal. But for this I might have known nothing of his challenge, as I have received no communication from Mr. Cumberland himself, though I have waited several days in the expectation that he would take care that the matter did not escape my attention. I now ask you to be kind enough to publish my reply.

Mr. Cumberland's letter is so ingeniously worded that to those who do not read it carefully, and who at the same time know nothing of my professions, his proposals may appear to be fair and reasonable. In reality they are quite the reverse. If I understand him rightly he desires to put my "alleged supernatural powers to a decisive test," and accordingly proposes that I shall "produce, or cause to be produced, physical manifestations called spiritual" in his presence, and that of a chosen committee; and should I "succeed in getting the spirits to demonstrate" he will undertake to explain away such demonstrations by natural means to the satisfaction of the committee—(this committee to include himself and Mr. Labouchere!)—failing which he is willing to forfeit the sum of £1,000, Mr. Labouchere being also willing, he believes, to supplement this sum with another £1,000.

Now, Sir, I emphatically protest against the assumptions which Mr. Cumberland has thus put forward—ignorantly, I hope, but apparently with the distinct purpose of prejudicing me in the eyes of your readers. I do not allege that I am possessed of "supernatural powers." I do not claim to be able to "produce, or cause to be produced, physical manifestations called spiritual" (sic). I do not profess, and never did profess, to "succeed in getting the spirits to demonstrate." All that I assert is this—that certain unusual phenomena frequently take place in my presence, notably writing executed under circumstances which preclude the possibility of its being produced through the active agency of any person or power visibly present. I have no power to produce it—for it often fails to come when desired—and I take no part in its production; nor can I explain the process of its accomplishment. I have no responsibility in the matter, and do not profess to be able to give any intelligible reason why I should be the subject of these abnormal experiences. But the fact remains—as has been proved to the complete satisfaction of many hundreds of patient investigators, including men of the highest intelligence in every rank of life, men whose capacity for exact observation and correct judgment would be readily admitted in relation to any other matter. And in May last experiments were tried publicly, in the presence of a large audience, in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall. A committee was appointed by the audience to conduct the experiments, those chosen being Surgeon-General Wolesey, Mr. Brinsley Nixon (of the Athenæum Club), Florence Marryat, Miss Major, and Dr. Geo. Wyld. I sat with them on the platform; two slates, which had been previously cleaned and examined by all the committee, lying upon the table before us, in full light, one upon the other, with a crumb of pencil between them. After a short interval writing was distinctly heard in the course of execution, and on the slates being examined the upper side of the under slate was found to be covered. In a second experiment a word then and there suggested by one of the audience was written between closed slates, under similar conditions; and at the close all the committee openly testified that the experiments had been conducted to their entire satisfaction, and that they were perfectly convinced that it was an impossibility for the writing to have been produced by ordinary means.

Seeing, then, that I have afforded all reasonable facilities for investigation to persons disposed to approach the subject in a candid and impartial spirit, I might fairly decline, I think, to notice Mr. Cumberland's challenge. But, lest my motive should be misinterpreted, and because I have no other desire than the elucidation of the truth, I have determined to accept it, subject only to certain modifications which I cannot doubt will commend themselves to the judgment of all reasonable minds.

In the first place, I absolutely decline to meet, for the purpose of this investigation, either Mr. Cumberland or any of the gentlemen whose names he has suggested. They are all, I believe, so far committed to a hostile attitude in relation to these phenomena that it would be next to a miracle for them to be able to reach the position of fair and unbiassed observers. Moreover, both Mr. Cumberland and Mr. Labouchere have gratuitously insulted me by the use of opprobrious epithets. As to Mr. Labouchere, when he applied to me, in his paper, the terms "knave," "rogue," "cheat," "vagabond," &c., I can make some allowance for his sledge-hammer style, which I have myself frequently admired in his fearless exposure and denunciation of certain abuses; and it is possible that in denouncing me he may have thought he was doing a public service. He may have written under a sense of conviction, but if so, it is a conviction which did not entitle him to attack me in such unmeasured terms (to use the mildest expression), inasmuch as it was not founded upon any personal knowledge or evidence whatsoever. As to Mr. Cumberland, I take it that, as a professional "muscle-reader" and conjurer, his chief motive is to increase his own notoriety.

In the second place I cannot consent that any of the parties to an investigation should, even voluntarily, be pledged to the forfeit of £1,000 in the event of the decision being against them. They would be more than human if the mere possibility of such a forfeit did not, even unconsciously to themselves, in some measure dim their eyes against the recognition of an unwelcome truth.

What I propose is this—that a committee of six be appointed, three to be chosen by myself and three by—I do not care by whom, so that they are gentlemen of good reputation and have not committed themselves to a hostile attitude before the experiments are commenced. I will meet this committee at any place that may be mutually agreed upon, and they shall be at liberty to provide their own slates. But as I am not a conjurer, as the phenomena do not come at my command, and as I do not use "any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise," the committee shall agree to meet on six separate occasions before they shall conclude that the experiments are futile. If the experiments succeed they shall report the fact to Mr. Cumberland; shall call upon him, in accordance with his promise, to "explain away such demonstrations by natural means to the satisfaction of the committee;" and shall require him to produce the same phenomena, observing the same conditions, as were produced and observed in my presence.

I would send a copy of this letter, as an act of courtesy, to Mr. Cumberland, were it not that in his letter to you he has failed to give his address.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EGLINTON.

The Pall Mall Gazette of Thursday also publishes the following letter which Signor Damiani has addressed to Mr. Labouchere:—

To Henry Labouchere, Esq., M.P.

SIR,—In the columns of this journal, under date of 31st ult., I find it stated that you "have no faith in the Spiritualistic quackery, and are willing to give £1,000 for the pleasure of being converted to the belief that the slate-writing occurring in the presence of Mr. W. Eglinton is not the result of trickery." As one of those who have publicly attested to both the reality of the phenomenon and the straightforwardness of Mr. W. Eglinton in the matter, I shall take up the cudgels in defence of truth, of Mr. Eglinton, and of my powers of penetration. I, therefore, propose that you and I shall deposit the sum of £1,000 each in the hands of a well-known London banker, and then empanel a jury of eight gentlemen, four on each side (to consist exclusively of men of independent position, members of the learned professions, and literary men), in whose presence Mr. Eglinton shall sit (I having obtained his consent for that) for the production of psychography. If the majority of the jury shall say that the writing between the closed and locked slates has been produced by legerdemain, the £2,000 will be handed to you; if they decide vice versa the £2,000 will be mine. Should you accept this challenge we shall fix the supplementary conditions of the meeting as to time, &c.—I am, Sir, truly yours,

G. DAMIANI.

29, Colville-road, Notting Hill,
January 7th.

P.S.—After having, with your permission, settled this question of slate-writing, I shall be happy to meet you again with a £1,000 or two, to decide whether Spiritualism is quackery or the greatest event of this barbarous age. It is lamentable that questions of such importance can but be decided by the only argument of any value in these materialistic times of L. s. d.—G. D.

TWO PHASES OF "SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA."

PSYCHOGRAPHY: THE "PASSAGE OF MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

BY J. MAIR ROLPH.

As all the results of séances through the mediumship of Mr. W. Eglinton are doubtless interesting to many of your readers, I take the liberty of sending a brief account of my experiences with that gentleman.

Having been very sceptical as to the truth of the facts of psychography, I, for a long time, was opposed to the idea of holding a séance at Old Quebec-street. At last I yielded; partly, I suppose, to my innate curiosity, and partly in conformity with a wish of my sister. I wrote to Mr. Eglinton, asking him to give me an appointment, and on the day named, armed with three slates, slate pencils, coloured chalks, and a sponge, bought en route expressly for the occasion, I betook myself to Mr. Eglinton's chambers. That gentleman was sitting at his writing table, in the well-known séance room, and he immediately came forward, welcoming me in a most cordial manner. On my telling him that I was sceptical as to the truth of psychographic facts, he said: "If you will come with me into the next room I may perhaps be able to dispel your doubts, but I must inform you, beforehand, that I can never guarantee results, as I am not able to control the power, or force it to manifest itself; I can only, as the medium, invite communication." One séance led to more, and as with many others before me, they ended in my being compelled to acknowledge the existence of an intelligent force, acting externally to the medium, and in direct contravention of the hitherto recognised laws of matter.

With but few exceptions I used my own slates in all the séances, the exceptions being when mine were filled with communications I wished to preserve or copy; and a few times when Mr. Eglinton's double slates, in their case with their Bramah lock and key, were used. Each of my slates was used for the first time in exactly the condition I brought it from the shop, being perfectly void of writing and requiring no further cleaning. All the answers received were intelligent and germane to the questions I put, treating generally on private family matters, of which Mr. Eglinton could have had no previous knowledge. The questions were partly vidé voce, partly written, and of the contents of the latter Mr. Eglinton was not cognisant, he, at his own request, not having been allowed to see them. I was alone with Mr. Eglinton at all the séances. We used single slates, double ones, the one fitting accurately on the other, as also the pair in a case with a Bramah lock and key.

The single slates we used mostly for vidé voce questions, under conditions now so generally known that it would be needless to recapitulate them. The single slates were always held under the flap of a small "Pembroke" table, and pressed against its under surface by Mr. Eglinton's right hand, his thumb resting above the flap and his wrist open to view. The double slates were placed sometimes under the table flap, sometimes on the table; at other times they were held by us both, away from, but not necessarily lower than, the table; once, indeed, we held them some distance above it, both of us standing at the time; and once Mr. Eglinton placed them on my head, when I not only heard the writing, to the dotting of the "i's" and the crossing of the "t's," but felt distinctly the vibration of the slates during the writing.

The séances were with one exception held in the back-room, but at my request one was held in the front drawing-room, into which we carried the Pembroke table, after I had, for the second time, minutely examined it, and convinced myself of the impossibility of secret mechanism or any kind of trickery in connection with it.

I received from my son three communications in his own handwriting, and one dictated by him. The first direct communication, containing a French quotation, was twenty-eight lines in length; the second, which was obtained when two clean slates were firmly tied together and placed on the table, shewed thirty-two lines; the third one, which was written when two clean slates, accurately fitted the one on the other, were placed by Mr. Eglinton on my head, contained twenty-one lines. The dictated message had twenty-eight lines, inclusive of an eight-lined quotation from one of Goethe's poems, written in strictly correct German. Once, when holding at some distance from the table one end of two clean, close-fitting slates, Mr. Eglinton grasping the opposite end, I heard the stoppage of the writing in consequence of Mr. Eglinton withdrawing his left from my right hand; on joining hands again, at my request, the writing was continued and ended on the other slate. All answers were written from the medium and topsy-turvy to him. They commenced, generally, two to two and a-half inches from that part of the slate frame immediately under Mr. Eglinton's thumb, and though the slates were under the flap of the table, they were visible to me the whole time; therefore no exchange of the slate or slates could possibly have occurred without my perceiving it, and I kept a sharp look-out. The flap bar could not have given Mr. Eglinton any assistance in holding the slates under the table, as some of my slates were too short to come within range of contact with the bar, which, moreover, has no margin for "play" to the right or the left. The slates I used were nine and a-half by seven and a-half, and twelve by nine inches, and I doubt if even the longer one reached to the flap bar. In the one séance, after some answers to vidé voce questions, in which I particularly avoided all names, I wrote on Mr. Eglinton's Bramah lock double slate a question to a cousin of mine, a Mrs. N. I. T. Mr. Eglinton was ignorant of the question. I myself put between the slates a bit of red chalk, locked the case, and taking the key out kept it beside me in full view on the table. We waited some time, but no answer came, and no sign of writing was heard. Mr. Eglinton once or twice drew the slate about half its length from under the flap, and then slid it back again, as though to cozen the power, but still there was no sign of writing. At last, asking me to release my hold of his left hand, he turned half way on his chair, and taking one of several envelopes lying on the writing-table behind him, placed it on the outside of the slate case, then sliding it under the table he gave me his left hand again to hold in my two hands. On my asking why he had put the envelope on the case, he answered, "Perhaps we shall get a communication." After waiting some time longer, during which Mr. Eglinton repeatedly drew the slate out some distance from under the flap and slid it back again, each time discovering the envelope on the outside, in the exact position it was placed at first, he began to breathe very heavily, and convulsive shudders ran through his frame, and at last we heard the writing. After the three final taps Mr. Eglinton withdrew the case from under the flap, and handing it over to me, requested me to unlock it. I did so, and on opening it, inside, between the slates, I found the envelope with (in my own son's handwriting in the red chalk) the words:—

"Dear Father,—"

"W—y."

"This is matter through matter," as well as my cousin's answer. This astonished me. I could not in any way account for it. I took up the case, locked it again, and tried to force the envelope through its interstices, but found that it shut too close to admit the very thinnest envelope. Here could have been no trickery or jugglery. I saw the thumb of Mr. Eglinton's right hand on the table the whole time he held the case beneath it; his whole wrist was also visible; his left hand was held in my two hands; one of my feet was under the flap of the table, and the key of the case beside me on the table the whole time. I immediately determined to ask my son to explain the meaning of the words, "matter through matter." A clean slate was, under the usual conditions, held by Mr. Eglinton under the flap of the table, and I asked the explanation vidé voce. The writing began almost instantly, and on the slate being withdrawn, after the final taps, we read the following answer:—

"It means that matter is disintegrated by the spirit-power which we have at our command, thence it is easy to dissolve ordinary matter, and restore it again by the same process."

Considering the writing on the envelope as the spontaneous manifestation on my son's part, I determined to ask him for a further communication in his own hand and received the following:—

"My dear Father,—I only have very little power to-day in which to send you a message in my own writing. I want to tell you how happy this communion with you is making me, not only because it advances me in the spheres, but because of the good it is doing you. H. sends you her best love, as do I to both you and to Aunt J. The latter must take care of herself, for I see that her health is not so good as it should be. Forgive me to-day, but believe that I am ever around you.—Your loving son in spirit-life, "W . . . y."

The slate with this communication is still in my possession and on it is written (in his own hand) at my request:—

"Two clean slates were put together and placed on Mr. R.'s head and this is the result.

"W. EGLINTON."

Having read that sometimes fac-similes of letters of the alphabet, and numbers, had been requested and produced, I asked Mr. Eglinton if he thought that the power could copy a simple drawing. "Very probably; we will try, if you like," he answered. Now my slates were nearly filled with answers, all of which I intended to copy when I got home, but on one of them I thought there was space enough left to make the experiment, so, without sponging out the writing on it, we used that slate, fitting it on another upon which also there was a communication. I drew something very absurd, two figures in simple lines, a reminiscence of what I saw years ago in the Fliegende Blätter ("Fly-leaves"), an Augsburg weekly comic paper, purporting to shew the height of joy and grief in lines. I drew the two figures, gave them face downwards to Mr. Eglinton, and the two slates were held by him under the usual conditions beneath the flap of the table. I asked vidé voce for a copy of the drawings. We soon heard a scratching, and I exclaimed, "I verily believe they are being copied." After the three taps, on withdrawing and uncovering the slates, we found the two figures very decently copied.

I then asked for some numbers, naming them, and the word "Alice" to be written, which was done instantly. Shortly before we broke off this last séance, Mr. Eglinton, taking up the double slate-case in which was an answer from my cousin, J. S., said, "I should like to try an experiment with you, Mr. Rolph." "I have no objection," I answered, adding, "Had I not better copy that answer first?" "That you can do afterwards; we must utilise the power while it lasts." He then asked me to close and lock the case, and put the key in my pocket. Having done so, Mr. Eglinton requested me, if I had no objection, to lay my eye-glasses on the outside of the case. At first I demurred, but remembering that I had another pair with me, I placed the closed eye-glasses upon the case. Mr. Eglinton then put case and glasses under the flap of the table, and, as usual, I held his left hand in my two hands. After waiting some time, Mr. Eglinton, breathing heavily, became very much agitated; bending far over the table he appeared as though gradually forced out of his chair. He begged me to put my hands farther over his left hand, and to press it down upon the table, which I did. Mr. Eglinton becoming more and more agitated, I began to feel uncomfortable, but at last he cried out, "Press firmer, please, firmer; I feel them snatching at it." I pressed down his hands with all my strength, bending over the table till our heads almost touched together. Presently Mr. Eglinton sank back into his chair, and convulsively withdrawing the case from under the flap of the table handed it to me to unlock. On opening the case I found my glasses between the slates inside, but open. I exclaimed, "That is also matter through matter, or solid through solid." "Yes," answered Mr. Eglinton, "and you have, Mr. Rolph, been fortunate in witnessing it, for such manifestations of power are not always obtainable. You have been altogether very successful in your séances with me." I then proceeded to copy my cousin's communication from the double slate, when I discovered that there was no signature. On mentioning this to Mr. Eglinton he took the case, put in a bit of slate-pencil, closed and locked it, and giving me the key, put the case again under the flap of the table, and said, "We particularly wish for the signature of the writer, would you kindly give it us?" Immediately we heard the writing, and on opening the case, when withdrawn from under the flap, I found her signature at the foot of the communication.

In all the séances I particularly noted that question and answer were never on the same slate surface; the hypothesis, therefore, that the medium can write the answers with the disengaged fingers of his right hand falls to the ground, as in the one case, that of a single slate, by such action the question would be certainly smudged, if not completely obliterated; or, as also in the case of two slates being used, the one on the other, the medium would be obliged to write through the one slate surface,—an utter impossibility; and, lastly, no medium could stretch his fingers, which naturally would cause a corresponding strain and muscular movement of his thumb above the table, and of his wrist (which would instantly be detected by even the most superficial observer), so as to write from the top to the bottom of a twelve-inch slate with the increased difficulty of writing from and topsy-turvy to himself.

My series of séances with Mr. Eglinton I consider to have been so successful that I can only advise all those who are sceptical to pay him a visit, that their eyes may be, as mine have been, opened to the truth of the existence of an intelligent power working outside the physical power of the medium, capable of manifesting itself contrary to the hitherto accepted laws of matter.

I trust that this summary of my experience with Mr. Eglinton may meet your approval for publication as additional testimony to his wonderful powers.

THE Republican, Burlington, Kansas, reports a séance with a medium, G. Search: In the dark circle, a guitar and a violin circulated playing over our heads, and hands were felt by all of us on our heads, faces and hands. In the light circle, the medium, sitting in view of the circle, forming one of it by all, including himself, holding hands, various hands were projected between the folds of the curtain before which he sat.

THE World, a short time back, contained the following interesting sketch: "Mrs. Weldon transacts her affairs in offices in Red Lion-court, Fleet-street. We found her in the midst of books, papers, and legal documents. She receives politely; dresses very plainly but in perfect taste; wears her hair short; her countenance is vivacious; her eyes bright and piercing. In conversation we found her precise in facts, figures, and dates. She hears what is reported against her with self-possession and good nature. She has law at her finger-ends for conducting her own suits, all of which she is confident of gaining, and enough of it to spare for others of her sex whom she thinks wronged. One wonders how she could ever have been charged with being insane. She is certainly unlike other women; although eminently feminine, her mind is masculine, and she believes she has missions, one to look after orphans, another to expose the evils of the Lunacy Laws, but surely here is no indication of insanity! One cannot but admire her courage. She has a detestation for every form of pretence and shams. Judges, counsel, solicitors, and mad-doctors may rest assured that it will be long before they have heard the last of Mrs. Weldon."

CHRISTMAS WEEK WITH THE SPIRITS

AND A

SUMMARY OF FIRE LIGHTING PHENOMENA FOR SIX MONTHS.

By MORELL THEOBALD.

On Sunday, the 21st September, we had the pleasure, and I may add, the privilege, of a visit from Mr. Eglinton, who sat with us at our usual evening séance, by special spirit direction. That day being our daughter's birthday, we had put out (overnight) some birthday presents, among which, in the morning, was found a letter in direct spirit writing from several of our spirit group, in their well-known and inimitable handwriting; and on her pillow that morning she found, on waking, one of the presents, which had been tied up overnight, in the paper in which we had wrapped it, but with the string removed. No one in the house knew anything as to these nocturnal occurrences. On coming downstairs the gas stove and the kitchen fire were both found alight, with two kettles on, boiling ready for an early cup of tea: later on at 11.30 another fire was lit by our invisible friends in a room we were about to use.

At the séance in the evening we had expected that E. M. would materialise and speak to us, he having said he intended to do so, but although there was considerable spirit power manifested, in the way expected we were disappointed. At the end, however, one of Mr. Eglinton's spirit guides spoke and told us that E. M. thought that he could do more permanent good to our home circle by not then materialising but by aiding in developing this power for future occasions. We were directed to sit on Christmas Day at Haslemere. On the two following days two of our home circle felt the "power" in so oppressive a manner as to cause illness and a complete collapse of physical strength for twelve hours, after which it ceased, leaving a development of other senses unknown before—to which I do not purpose here further to refer.

On the following Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, we had the same early fire lightings by invisible agency to which we have become accustomed now for many months, with the addition of one fire being lit in the middle of the day, at 1.30, in a room we wished to use in the afternoon. No one was near it when it was lit.

The day before Christmas Day we all went to our favourite resting box at Haslemere, locking up the house until the following Monday, with the simple arrangement that a woman and her child were to come in, with the aid of the latch key, and sleep there each night.

I left my study and other rooms locked up; and in my study I was careful also to lock up my table drawer, in which I keep—and there only—certain paper devoted to direct spirit writing. No one entered this room until I myself unlocked it on Monday, the 29th. These particulars I beg my readers to note; and also to observe that the woman we left in charge at night is obviously one whom we thoroughly trust; moreover, she is not an adept at writing!

On Christmas Day, at Haslemere, raps came very freely while sitting around the tea table, replying vigorously to questions, and otherwise noting the conversation as it went on. Sitting en séance, at six o'clock we were directed, as soon as our medium was entranced and taken away from the circle to the corner of the room, to put out the lights. When this was done, we had conversation in direct spirit voice, while spirit presences flitted about the room, drawing their drapery over the hands of some of the sitters, who consisted entirely of our own family circle. We then heard a rustling of paper, apparently fluttering slowly from the ceiling; it finally dropped in front of myself with also some other thing, which, on lighting up, proved to be a blue pencil taken from a box of twelve coloured pencils left at Granville-park in our closed house.

The paper was a sheet from my own stock at Granville-park, left doubly-locked up as previously stated; on it was written in five different coloured crayons a simple greeting, as follows:—

in brown.....Xmas day

blue.....taken from drawer in your study at Granville-park, written with chalks downstairs and brought here to-night—the pencils you will find with all the points broken.

green.....We all

blue.....wish you a brown.....Merry Christmas and red.....a bright new year

yellow.....and may every thing blue.....prosper with you all and all brown.....happiness attend you all wherever you may be. J.W.E.

signed in blue.....Louisa. T. T. Lynch. Harry red.....Emily — Pompon

brown.....Saadi. Wamuk

and inside the paper is written in a child's handwriting:—

in blue.....Dear Mamma. Me am taken care of this house with Harry. Pompon.

"Pompon" doubtless felt her responsibility and importance! I asked particularly as to the circumstances under which this was written—whether the woman was in the house or not, and how the "power" could be obtained when the house was thus empty. After a good deal of questioning, I arrived at the following statement: The paper was written on "while the bells were ringing for church," about a quarter to eleven—no one then being in the house. The power was obtained from our medium at Haslemere that morning about eight o'clock, by entrancing her (this was found to be the case at that time). The "power" was stored till the message was written, and they used the room downstairs because Mary usually sits there, and we also when en séance. The signatures, which were in their own handwriting, were appended in the evening at Haslemere, while we were sitting. The point of the blue pencil thrown down on the table was broken, and on arriving home I myself opened the new box of crayons—a present to Tom—and found the remaining eleven points all broken off as they told us we should find them. "Pompon" told me she would open the door for me on going home. This she did as I was walking up the path, and the only two people then in the house were at the piano in the drawing-room, indulging in song. They had recently passed the hall door—shut. This opening of the door to us is a favourite diversion of little Pompon, and it is frequently done when the inmates are at the top of the house.

Now without taking into consideration the characters of all who could by any possibility be concerned in this fact of writing, it seems to me to be a phenomenon which could not be completed under our own eyes and inspection without admitting the power as emanating from those whose signatures claim it. If it were done as stated, no one was in the house at the time; and I found on my return home that my study and the drawers within it were locked, as I myself had left them; nor had a thing been touched: everything was as I had left it plus dust! But I claim character as an important factor in all such phenomena, and it is time that Spiritualists insisted on the same when collusion is hinted at so glibly by persons to whom such facts are startling.

Let me complete the week at Haslemere; and I will record failures as well as successes. We left each night wood and coals in the kitchen, trusting that there we might have our fire lighted as it is now invariably lighted at home. Here we could not conveniently lay the fire over night, and our man and his wife sleep close adjoining the GLASGOW.—At the morning meeting in the Hall, 2, Carlton-place, last Sunday, the controls of Mrs. Wallis discoursed with their wonted ability on "Truth v. Expediency." The usual discussion permitted at the morning meetings followed, after which the meeting formed itself into a committee for the consideration of the Society's business, and the reports of the secretary and treasurer, which were then submitted. The financial report of the Association is subjoined as its "dry details" may perhaps interest and encourage other societies struggling for existence, hitherto with less success than has of late become the portion of the Glasgow Association. Tributes of thanks were cordially paid to the indefatigable president, Mr. James Robertson, who has always been a host in himself: to the painstaking and methodical treasurer, Mr. Findlay, as well as to other individual members who had signalled their practical devotion to the cause of Spiritualism by special zeal and effort during the past year. Mrs. Wallis again occupied the platform in the evening, the subject of her guides' discourse being "Contentment, Courage and Cheerfulness: A New Year's Lesson." The audience was numerous in spite of inclement weather, and the utterances fertile in thought and vigorous in form and expression.—ST. MUNGO.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

NEWCASTLE.—The ladies connected with the Newcastle Society announce their intention to hold a sale of work, &c., on Monday and Tuesday, January 26th and 27th, 1885, in the Lecture Hall, Weir's-court, Newcastle, in aid of the important work which this Society is doing in the public advocacy of the movement. The sympathy and support of all friends and Spiritualists is kindly invited, and their presence thereat will be appreciated. The sale of work, &c., will take place each day from four to ten p.m. Admission 3d. each. A refreshment stall will be provided. Vocal and instrumental music at intervals.

MENTAL SUGGESTION.—Professor Delbona has been lecturing at the Liège University upon this subject, taking for his text an article in the Revue Philosophique, by M. Richet. At first it seems improbable that a man can, without gesture or speech, make his thought felt, and be responded to by another, but the facts stated by the Professor of his own observation and that of M. Richet, seemed to demonstrate its possibility. His audience testified its assent and approbation.—Le Messager.

A PRONIGY.—Young Jacopo Inaudi is now exhibiting his wondrous faculty at the Liège Theatre. La Scène cannot find language to express its astonishment at this youthful prodigy. It says: "He plays with complicated difficulties of calculation in each department of arithmetic, extracts the square root of a number in which enter thousands, &c., and all with rapidity and without apparent effort, and half-an-hour afterwards is able to repeat the result of these mental operations."—Le Messager.

THE DIVINING ROD.—G. B. Stebbins writes: Cyrus Field, of Livonia, is known to have found water above a hundred times, and he sends written testimonies of the fact. He continues, that at Cyrus Field's house, talking about it he said, "We can shew the thing right here." Taking a pear-tree branch, he held a fork of it in each hand, the end from him upwards at an angle of about forty-five degrees, and walked slowly across the room. When in the middle, his hands being motionless, the end dipped and the forks of the branch bent in his grasp. This was done again and again. He said that under the floor, about twelve feet, the spring rose which flowed out at the pent stock behind, and that he found the spring with the forked branch years ago.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

kitchen and were early on the qui vive to hear the wood crackling. But for some reason it could not be done. However, on Boxing Day, just as our medium and my daughter, coming in from a long walk, opened the front door, I heard the sound of wood crackling over head in our own bedroom. This fire had been laid in the morning, as usual, by our housekeeper, and I at once ascertained that no one was on the upper floor where our bedroom is situated, nor had anyone been there for some time. Had any person walked overhead, my wife and I, who were in the room under, would have heard them. This fire, then, was lit at four o'clock in the afternoon practically under our own inspection, as has, of course, frequently happened at home. I am particular in stating these circumstances, as this phenomenon is interesting to many friends, and I am continually being questioned about it.

From a careful record which I keep, I find that during the six last months of the year the results of fire lighting phenomena stand thus:—

In July, either the gas-stove or kitchen fire was lit by our spirit friends every morning, and during that month fires were also lit four times during the day.

In August, we were only at home three days, on each of which the fires were lit in the early morning.

In September every morning, without exception, and three times during the day also.

In October, every morning without exception, and twenty-five times also during the day. (Fires in sitting-rooms were now in requisition.)

In November. Every morning without exception, and every day during some part of it also without exception.

In December. Every morning excepting the five days we were at Haslemere, and there once in the afternoon as recorded above. Every day also when at home one fire or more has been lit by our spirit friends.

Our trustworthy medium frequently has them lit under her eyes, or while in the act of laying the fire; twice have I myself had them lit under my own inspection, i.e., once in the bath-room while it was locked up, the key in my pocket, and I on the qui vive; and once in the drawing-room while I sat within view of the door, and of course, within hearing of any sound. My wife, who is, of course, more at home, has constantly had them lit under her cognizance, though not actual sight. My daughter frequently has actually witnessed the lighting, as have four persons together on one occasion to which I have referred in "Spiritualism at Home." My early morning records are, of course, taken from Mary and my daughter, for whom I claim absolute care and truthfulness: outsiders, with their many suggestions, will trust more for proof of the phenomena to records of those which occur during the day. If anyone can suggest tests which I have not devised, and which are practicable under the conditions required for such phenomena, I shall be glad to receive such hints, but of the facts I am as certain as I am of my existence. I trust this will suffice on this phase of mediumship, for we see others coming on.

January 1st, 1885.

BALLOON STEERING.—The French balloon with steering apparatus, charged with ordinary or hydrogen gas, according to the ascending power required, is cigar-shaped, pointed at each end; a net hangs from it with seats for two aeronauts and the directing apparatus, the force for which is supplied by a series of electric accumulators having a 10 horse-power. According to the Cologne Gazette, Dr. Woelfert has been equally successful in Germany. In one of his experiments he was in the air two hours and a-half, moving, part of the time, against the wind.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each siter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. L. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1887.

MATTER THROUGH MATTER.

In the last number of "LIGHT," "C.C.M." says, in effect, in reference to my ring experiments with Mr. Husk, "Dr. Wyld's evidence is complete and without flaw," but Mr. Gurney, on the contrary, regrets that "the conditions were not more completely unexceptionable," and he adds, "the account as it stands is far from conclusive."

Now with reference to this most occult subject, the difficulties in the way of belief are so great as to render perfect tests absolutely necessary; but, as I have already said, it has taken me four years to arrive at my present conclusions, and therefore I think even Mr. Gurney should admit that I have shown considerable prudence and discretion, and that when he criticises one having some claims to being an expert on any given spiritualistic subjects he should be very careful to be very exact and logical.

Still, I feel, perhaps more deeply than Mr. Gurney does, that so stupendous a secret of nature should be tested and re-tested, and therefore it is my intention, if possible, to arrange some sittings with Mr. Husk for "ring phenomena," and I feel this, that if he could make these experiments his speciality he would then, if successful, occupy a position in relation to spiritualistic phenomena as important as that now occupied by Mr. Eglinton.

I am in the hope that Mr. Husk could, by practice, at last produce these ring experiments in a lighted room, the hands of the operators and the rings only being in darkness, as produced by an efficiently constructed or arranged hollow cover. I am induced to hazard this opinion, because when on one occasion a friend of mine having got, while holding the medium's hand, my ring placed on his wrist, and not being able to remove it, asked me what he was to do, I advised him to hold the medium's hand, the room being in full light, behind the dark window curtain, which he doing, the ring immediately fell to the ground, the hands being still joined.*

But although I agree with Mr. Gurney that we cannot be too rigid in our tests, I must yet repeat that those who criticise carefully conducted experiments, should themselves endeavour to be very exact and very logical, and these qualities I think Mr. Gurney has not shown in the present instance.

Mr. Gurney opens his criticism thus: "Dr. Wyld tells us that he has been in the habit of carrying about his ring for purposes of experiment." But if Mr. Gurney will re-peruse my narrative he will find that he does not exactly represent me, for my words are, "For years I have been experimenting with my iron rings"—not ring, but rings. The fact is that I have experimented with three iron rings and many rings made of copper wire, so twisted as to fit the wrists of the medium exactly, and thus render their passage, when intact, over the hands impossible. This remark is important, for as Mr. Gurney's criticisms are chiefly based on the probability of the medium having deceived me by making a duplicate of my ring, it so far renders this interpretation less probable when there are many rings.

Mr. Gurney goes on to say: "Dr. Wyld does not tell us that he has invariably preserved his ring from examination. One would be glad to know how he has assured himself that his private marks have not been detected and imitated." To this I reply that I have taken no precautions to keep my rings secret, but, on the contrary, have freely exhibited them to sitters and mediums, and on the late occasion I insisted on Mr. Husk taking my ring home with him and keeping it constantly next his person for a week, in order that his "magnetism" should render my ring familiar to his controlling spirit.

Mr. Gurney may perhaps smile at my simplicity, but those who understand these subjects know that I acted wisely in so doing, and that, moreover, there is great wisdom in these matters in putting yourself in sympathy with mediums, and at least appearing to have a little "childlike, credulous affection," as Longfellow says.

Then as to Mr. Husk dishonestly manufacturing a duplicate of my ring, I am morally sure he would not if he could, and perfectly sure he could not if he would; for as the said ring has on its surface probably 1,000 minute markings, some of them as small as pin-points, but distinguishable from their position, besides my own all but invisible marks, I am sure that neither Mr. Husk nor any human being could manufacture an exact duplicate—except, perhaps, Madame Blavatsky, assisted by an Occult Brother!

My critic then says, in reply to my statement that the ring was put into and taken from my hand by "Irresistible," "Dr. Wyld does not say how he knew this." Well, I wrote "Irresistible" between inverted commas to indicate that the ring was placed in my hand by some one calling himself "Irresistible," but, for the matter of that, it was entirely a matter of indifference to me whether "Irresistible" did it or Mr. Husk did it, and no doubt Mr. Gurney will admit that it would be equally difficult for either party by non-occult means to pass my iron ring through Mr. Husk's wrist.

Mr. Gurney next objects to my being "satisfied" that the ring put into my hand by "Irresistible" immediately previous to the final operation, was my own ring. Now, I am still morally satisfied that it was my own ring, but here again the identity of the ring outside Mr. Husk's wrist is not a question of primary importance, provided I am satisfied that no ring existed on Mr. Husk's arm previous to the grand coup, but that on the completion of the coup my own ring was found on his wrist.

Mr. Gurney admits that my "examination of the medium's wrist immediately preceding the experiment and my being satisfied that there was no ring there was more satisfactory," but he thinks it would have been still more satisfactory if "I had explored the nude arm as far as the elbow." Well, I did not explore the nude arm, because the medium wore a shirt and a coat sleeve, and to remove these while I held his left hand would have been a feat requiring the presence of the Davenport Brothers; but fortunately so impossible an experiment was not necessary, as an experimenter who could not detect a thick iron ring, considerably larger than the medium's wrist, through his coat sleeve would be one of so blunt a perception as to be unworthy of consideration.

My critic next observes: "Considering the ease with which a conjurer can deceive the unwary as to which of his two hands they are holding, we would be glad to know that Dr. Wyld made sure throughout that it was the medium's left hand that he held." To which I can only reply that I held the medium's hand throughout with a determined energy, as if life and death depended on it, and did not relax my hold for one moment.

Mr. Gurney then remarks, "that in these matters it is impossible to place implicit reliance on the report of a single sense of a single person." I think this is an incorrect assertion, for I can answer for myself that if Mr. Gurney told me that he had held a man's hand in the dark for one minute without relaxing his hold for an instant, I should believe him; and Mr. Gurney, I think, would himself believe it; for otherwise it would be an admission that he was an incompetent observer, and what Mr. Gurney would now say would probably be, "I can implicitly rely on the evidence of one sense in my own case, but in no one else's."

My critic then remarks that "it would have been much more satisfactory if some others present had satisfied themselves, by examination, that there was no ring on Husk's arm previous to the final experiment." I don't think I can admit this, and I will put it to Mr. Gurney, if he would have been much affected had I said that Captain James and Mrs. Fitzgerald had supplemented my examination?

However, as I was making a crucial experiment for my own satisfaction, I took very good care that no outsider should, by contact, interfere with the magnetic rapport between myself and Mr. Husk, as I held his hand, and all who understand these subtle subjects will applaud my resolution.

Finally, Mr. Gurney says, that as there are persons who can get their hands through what look like impossible apertures, therefore my attempt to confirm the experiment by measurements, to show that to pass my small ring over Mr. Husk's large hand was impossible, "has no real value, and the mention of it rather weakens than strengthens the case."

This seems to me a very illogical observation, viz., that because there are some pliable hands which can be squeezed through small rings, therefore Mr. Husk's large hand could have been squeezed through my small ring! But Mr. Gurney not having examined either Mr. Husk's hand or my ring, nor compared the two, has evidently, on this point, no logical right to express an opinion. Moreover, I will call on Mr. Gurney to show how this point in my demonstration, even if he found, by experiment, that I might be mistaken, could possibly weaken the case as stated up to this point?

Is it not self-evident that the weight of an argument cannot be lessened by the addition of a subsequent argument which has little or no weight?

Mr. Gurney might as well say a pound of sugar would weigh less than a pound, if there were added to it some bubbles of atmospheric air!

However, I will believe in Mr. Gurney's logic, and in the fourth dimension, when he can show that a rigid body, measuring, say nine, can be forced through a rigid body, measuring, say eight, without fracture or injury to either body.

Finally, I would remind Mr. Gurney that it is unsafe to use extreme terms in occult subjects, and when he says that tests by measurement in these matters can never have any real value, I would ask him if he would not admit that an iron or copper ring, fitting tightly to a human wrist, could not, without occult power, possibly be forced off that wrist and over the hand intact without the destruction of the hand?

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

Dr. Wyld will, no doubt, deal himself with Mr. Edmund Gurney's criticism of his experiment. But the question, what constitutes good evidence of these phenomena, is of such general interest and importance that a third person can hardly be considered intrusive for joining in the discussion. And Mr. Gurney is so competent and powerful a critic that any objections offered by him cannot be too carefully examined. For those of us who consider that these facts have already been superabundantly verified, must still recognise the prudence, if not the obligation, of allowing nothing put forward as a test experiment to pass without the severest scrutiny. But equally must we see that the evidence is not disparaged upon any illegitimate assumptions. At least one such assumption is, I think, contained in Mr. Gurney's letter. I will endeavour to show this, and shall also offer some remarks upon other points of his criticism.

"Considering," says Mr. Gurney, "the ease with which a conjurer can deceive the unwary as to which of his two hands they are holding, one would be glad to know that Dr. Wyld made sure throughout that it was the medium's left hand he held." Mr. Gurney is never irrelevant, and his general proposition must therefore be determined in relation to the evidence before him. That is to say, he must credit the conjurer with this ability in a case in which the fingers are not merely loosely linked, but "held in a firm and determined grasp." And then, we should like to know, in our turn, how much unwaryness the conjurer will require in the dupe for his purpose. For instance, if the conjurer says, "I want to scratch my nose," and gets his hand released by this or some other pretext, unwaryness having risen to the point of idiocy, the test is effectually destroyed. Without any extravagant estimate of Dr. Wyld's intelligence and experience in these investigations, I think that to such a supposition in this case, certain remarks of Zöllner and of Mr. Crookes, which will be found on p. 79 of "Transcendental Physics" (translation), are fairly applicable. But short of such a supposition being implied, Mr. Gurney can only mean by his "unwary" persons, those who are not on their guard against the more recondite expedients of conjuring, being ignorant thereof. And what I say is a pure assumption, unjustified by experience, is the notion that such expedients include means by which one hand, the fingers of which are firmly grasped with the very object of securely detaining them, can be changed for another without observation. The art of the conjurer consists largely in diverting attention at the critical moment. As to visual observation, without knowledge of just the one particular essential to be observed, this is comparatively easy. But when strong tactual sensation has to be withdrawn from a consciousness concentrated upon it, or at least to be much disturbed, it is quite another matter, and I don't believe that Mr. Gurney will find a conjurer in the world who will undertake to effect a change of hands unobserved under the conditions and circumstances described, and with a subject of average intelligence. The fact is, professional conjurers do not themselves claim for their art anything like the powers loosely ascribed to it by the public.*

Agreeing with Mr. Gurney, that there could be no satisfactory identification in the dark of the ring taken from Dr. Wyld, I observe that the latter does not, in his summary of the evidence, himself even mention this supposed identification as one of the circumstances on which he relies. Apart from this circumstance, however, I think Dr. Wyld must see that the identification of the ring found on the wrist with his own ring is a point quite unimportant, provided the dimensions are the same, and the rim of the ring found is ascertained to be perfectly solid. This being so, as it is not stated that the ring was not in the medium's possession before the séance, for evidential purposes the case would be just as good if the ring had been the medium's, except that it might then have been suggested that the dimensions had been fixed with reference to what the medium had found himself able to do by way of manipulation. By having himself fixed the dimensions, Dr. Wyld has excluded that suggestion, and we need not trouble ourselves further with questions of identification. Putting aside, for a moment, the evidence afforded by the measurements, the case hangs upon two points, (1) Could there have been a change of hands without observation; (2) Could Dr. Wyld have been deceived as to the non-presence of the ring when he examined the medium's arm and wrist? The first point has been dealt with. As to the second, Mr. Gurney requires an exploration of the nude arm up to the elbow. What Dr. Wyld says is, "I then passed my left hand over the medium's arm and wrist to satisfy myself that no ring was thereon."

We may take it that it was not the nude arm, and it is probable that a circular prominence of 5-16ths of an inch might be rendered imperceptible to a light touch by padding the sleeve. But the degree of pressure which may be supposed, considering the object expressly in view, and Dr. Wyld's knowledge of the thickness of the iron to be detected by his search, would certainly betray either the ring or the fact of a padded sleeve. Yet there can be no doubt of the propriety of the question raised by Mr. Gurney on this point, as nothing should be left to favourable presumption, even when that naturally arises, as I think it does, from the language of the witness. Even apart from the measurements, however, I see no flaw in the evidence, though confirmation may fairly be asked of what we should naturally, though not necessarily, understand from the account given.

As to the measurements, Mr. Gurney says: "But as there are undoubtedly persons who can get their hands through what look like impossible apertures, and as the degree to which this power is possessed cannot be ascertained except with the bona fide assistance of the person to be tested, the test can never have any real value;" and he even adds, "the mention of it rather weakens than strengthens the case." (How it can weaken the case that to explain it away requires the additional presumption that Mr. Husk has an exceptional hand, I cannot understand. For this power of compression, though facilitated by practice, probably presupposes an original conformation not commonly found.)

Now, according to Mr. Gurney, the fact that hands have been passed through apparently impossible apertures destroys the validity of proof by measurement that any given aperture is impossible for any given hand. Physical compressibility of a hand having been shown to exist to some apparently impossible degree, we are required to admit that no apparent impossibility of this kind can be depended on. Had the respective dimensions been five inches and eleven inches, instead of seven and nine, Mr. Gurney would still, it seems, not allow us to dispense with the actual negative demonstration which he says cannot be afforded. Now I submit that Dr. Wyld is entitled, as a man of science, to reply, "An indefinite fact is for scientific application no fact at all. In this case, the whole proof is one of degree. I give you exact dimensions. You tell me vaguely of a compressibility beyond what antecedently would be supposed possible. Very well. A difference of half-an-inch would suffice for that. I give you over two inches. Just as in regard to the conjurer's art, I call on you to determine your general statement by relation to the evidence before you, so here I say that your statement is only relevant if referring to a compressibility at least approximate to the disproportion here alleged. In that case I deny your fact and its possibility, and ask for your proof."

* Just before the Slade prosecution at Bow-street, I described to a friend the conditions of one of the successful psychographic experiments, and asked him if a conjurer could do that. He thought that one might. A few days later I put the same case to Mr. Maskelyne, in the witness-box, asking if his art was adequate to the result. "No," he at once replied, "not as you describe it," adding, with a smile, "but I should like to see it done."

On the whole, then, I see no reason to alter the opinion I expressed last week, that Dr. Wyld's case is one of very high evidential value. But we should be not the less obliged to Mr. Gurney for bringing his critical acumen to bear upon it.

C. C. M.

P.S.—Allow me to correct an inaccuracy in my letter last week. I spoke of the impossibility of a ring of seven inches diameter being on the arm under the sleeve. What I should have said was that its passage through the wrist end of the sleeve was impossible.

SPANISH BIGOTRY.

We learn from the October number of El Criterio Espiritista that Don Guillermo del Passo, for many years the manager of that publication, passed to the higher life October 1st, 1884, after a short but painful sickness. The deceased was one of the first in his country who became acquainted with Spiritualism; and as he took an active part in spreading the truths of the new philosophy, he thereby made many enemies, particularly among the clergy. Unable to combat his arguments, they had recourse to persecution, which followed him even after his death. As the ruling power in Spain, and claiming to control everything, both here and hereafter, not content with damning his soul, the "Church" refused interment for his body, insisting that as the cemetery where it was proposed to place it was consecrated (?) ground, it would be defiled by having him buried there. The remains were accordingly carefully laid away in a new cemetery—presumably in unconsecrated ground. The Criterio, after giving a full account of this inhuman treatment, without any strictures, simply adds: "This conduct does not seem to us to be just; but we think that by acting thus the Church has only injured herself."—Banner of Light.

As inducement to give anything but the simple results of spiritual forces should be removed from mediums. It is a question whether salaries should not be substituted for individual remuneration. I do not say this in disparagement, in any way, of those who have the gift of mediumship; they are human and in conditions common to humanity; they are neither better nor worse than preachers, lawyers, and doctors; who, as we know, sometimes avail themselves, with others, of the weaknesses and ignorance of clients.—J. Allyn, in the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

The venerable Dr. Buchanan has brought out a new work, "Therapeutic Sarcognomy." "Upon the Psychic functions of the brain," says the Eclectic Medical Advocate (N.Y.), "Professor Buchanan is the highest living authority. His present work is an exposition of the mystery of the conjoint operation of soul, brain, and body, introducing us to a new world of science. Its leading philosophical idea is that life is primarily of the soul, for all action of the body ceases on its departure. It shows the exact seat and operation of the vital principle in the nervous system, and the special vitality manifested in each region of the body."

A REMARKABLE SEANCE WITH MR. EGLINTON:

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER" AGAIN.

By J. FRED COLLINGWOOD, F.G.S.

On the 7th inst. I paid a visit with my wife and two nieces, Misses Mary and Lizzie Johnson, to Mr. Eglinton, at his residence, 11, Langham-street, Portland-place, for experiments in psychography; and as I met with much success and obtained some evidence beyond the immediate object of my visit well worth recording, I submit the following brief account for publication in "LIGHT":—

I may premise that the conduct of Mr. Eglinton's séances is so well known to your readers that I forbear to enter into familiar details, such as position at the table, the holding of the slate, &c., &c., especially as they have been so well set forth by Mr. Rolph in the current number.

After several questions had been put by us and replied to very pertinently in each case, I wrote, as hitherto, on one of my own new slates, the following question: "Is it right for Lizzie to sit for physical manifestations?"—wrote it away from the table so that nobody should know. The slate being held as usual, we heard the writing and received this reply: "Yes, it is quite right for her to sit for physical manifestations, Mr. Collingwood."

Mrs. Collingwood then wrote (a'so out of our sight) on Mr. Eglinton's double Bramah lock slate; and after a bit of pencil had been dropped in, locked it, placed the key upon the table in sight of us all, and handed the slate to Mr. Eglinton, who with Mary held it upon the table. No reply was immediately obtained and the slate was left upon the table.

I then produced my own book-slate, already tied with string, and with a bit of pencil inside, and it was held by Mr. Eglinton under the table. The string was removed from it while so held, Mr. Eglinton's left hand being grasped by that of Mary, and this sentence was written:—

no question having been asked.

Here we made an experiment with the intention, if possible, more completely to exclude the "thought-reading" element. I went to the bookcase, placed my back against it, and took a book at random. Mary wrote on a slate the number of a supposed page known only to herself, while Lizzie wrote the number of a line on the unknown page. The book was put by me on the slate containing the numbers, strict care being taken that it was not seen by anybody, and held under the table by both Mr. Eglinton and Mary, a request being made that the line indicated by the number might be quoted. The following was written:—

"There is no such page as 59 in the book."

On opening the book it was found that the pagination began at 65. The number chosen had been 59, and the forms of the figures were exactly imitated—a manifestly conclusive answer!

Mr. Eglinton, embodying an expressed wish of mine, asked whether "Ernest" would give us any hints as to the further development of "power" in my nieces. The following long answer was given:—

"You may rest assured that we shall do all we can to aid the development of your niece and that you will soon observe how we have been able to do this. There are not signs wanting that she will make a capital instrument for us to work through, but she will need careful development and in this you must trust us to use our judgment. Try and feel in regard to yourselves that we will help you all in our power, as also to a further elucidation of the truth which we propagate. And now God bless you.

"Your friend,
"ERNEST."

The above message was written within two slates held by Mr. Eglinton on the shoulder of Mary, her hand also grasping the slate and one of his two hands that held it. The writing was very distinctly heard by all present in this experiment, as in the others.

I asked, "Which niece is meant?" The reply was written in two different hands:—

"Mary, I look after."

"JOEY."

"Ernest means Lizzie."

It was remarked while the writing was being done that a pause occurred in the middle of the message. And now the locked slate, having remained untouched in the meantime, was again taken up from the table by Mr. Eglinton, and held by him and Mary upon it. Writing was heard by us, and on the slate being opened by Mrs. Collingwood, a pertinent answer to her written question was found, and we saw lying inside the slate the piece of string that had been removed from my book-slate.

Finally, I asked whether my presence en séance was in any way a hindrance. The reply, written in my book-slate was "No, good-bye."

While these experiments were going on, I had in my mind the grave aspersions which appear in Truth of January 1st. It is there stated that Mr. Eglinton, "like all Spiritualist humbugs, is not prepared to perform his feats under conditions which render jugglery impossible. . . . The stock-in-trade of all Spiritualists consists in evading such an inquiry." And the writer further remarks: "I wonder that a few people of sense do not go to Eglinton and expose him. Probably he changes the slates when there is a long message, and writes the message with a piece of slate pencil on his nail when there is a short one. To do the former is not difficult; a common slate can be taken out of its frame and another substituted in about one minute."

I ask that a careful comparison be made between the actual conditions as described in my account of our séance and the supposed methods of a totally ignorant or clumsy imitator of the real thing as expounded in the above quotation. Considerations of space forbidding me to enlarge, I can only hope that it will be patent to all who read this how vast is the difference.

Our sitting extended over an hour with scarcely an interruption in the phenomena, the chief of which I have here faithfully recorded. The interest in such results is great to most of us; the facts to some of us are enormous in their importance; and the advantages which undeveloped psychics may receive through contact with Mr. Eglinton will, in my opinion, be precious to them if they go to him with earnest, careful, patient, diligent search after truth, and reasonably accept in this matter, as in others of high concern, the teachings of nature.

ERRATUM.—In Mr. Theobald's article last week for "September" read "December," as is obvious.

THE CHRONO PLATES.—In answer to inquiries we wish to state that we did not announce the publication of these plates for any special date in January. We simply advertised their issue during the current month. The artist has found more time requisite than he at first thought would be necessary, but we hope not to be compelled to request any extension of time. They will appear as a supplement to "LIGHT" gratis (for subscribers only).

TO CORRESPONDENTS AND READERS OF "LIGHT."—We are extremely sorry to be again obliged to defer the publication of several articles and letters, especially an important piece of evidence on Esoteric Theosophy by Mr. Wm. Oxley. A review of that gentleman's "Egypt" also stands over till next week, as well as communications from W. R. T., A. E. Evans, J. Temperley Grey, H. B. L., J. Thompson, J. T. B. Paynter, R. Donaldson, and others. The pressure on our space of current topics has rendered this course unavoidable; we, therefore, beg the consideration of our friends, on the distinct understanding that we will not longer delay the publication of their communications than is absolutely necessary.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

"Ebor's" Difficulties.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am very much afraid that if "Ebor" does not mend his system of investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism, he will gain no satisfactory results, and his case will be hopeless. The member of a circle who could snatch at the garment of a spirit supposed to be manifesting itself, and not have patience enough to wait for the final issue of the phenomenon, is evidently in a very crude and rudimentary state of development.

However sincere, earnest, and prayerful such investigators may be, they will reap nothing but confusion while they conduct themselves in the fashion described. They had better let the subject entirely alone: they will do it more harm than good.

It appears to me that the root of all "Ebor's" difficulties is his impression that he can elicit more from the phenomena than they are intended to convey. He seems to be under the belief that spiritual things can be grasped by mechanical processes—that psychological problems can be solved by physical methods. No state of mind can be more open to the inroad of fallacies. We ought to understand that the phenomena of Spiritualism are abnormal, and cannot, therefore, of themselves be a reliable source of normal guidance and teaching. They are surely intended simply as a revelation of the existence of human beings who formerly lived on this earth. Having attained a knowledge of this great fact we must then devote ourselves to the acquisition of the philosophy and religion which underlie the fact, which influences ought to be our guides through the confusion of contradictory phenomena.

If we could always depend upon obtaining from spirits accurate information respecting the affairs of this life and the next, the exercise of our own faculties and energies in this mundane sphere would be comparatively neglected. The spirits do tell us sufficient of their occupations in the spiritual world to satisfy us that they devote themselves to our assistance and succour according to our deserts and qualities, and I doubt whether they can possibly do more overtly. We must bear in mind that our language is the growth of our life and experience here, and can only be used to express corresponding experiences; but if the special and peculiar existence of disembodied spirits is entirely different from ours and inconceivable by us, then their language to express this difference must be also different, and would be unintelligible to our understanding. Their mode of communicating with us must necessarily be limited by this condition; but, as far as they can gain access to our minds, through cultivation, study, and discipline, their teaching is of the highest, noblest, and most useful order. By steady faith in the co-operation of ministering spirits, art, science, literature, and religion may be cultivated to the highest standard; not, however, so much by attendance at séances as by the careful training of the human mind under the best practical influences, among which I specially reckon Christianity as expounded by its Founder. "Ebor" alludes to the apparent inefficacy of prayer in securing satisfactory results at séances. Admitted; but nothing is gained by being prayerful one minute and vulgarly inquisitive the next. One state of mind swamps the other. Sincerity and earnestness will be of little avail unless they are sustained.

I cannot conclude this letter without saying how much I admire and sympathise with the ideas expressed by your correspondent "Lily."—Yours, &c.,
London, January 3rd, 1885.

TRIDENT.

The Spiritualistic Challenge.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As a Spiritualist of more than twelve years' standing, I must respectfully yet indignantly protest against an exhibition on so profound a subject, such as that contemplated by Mr. Cumberland and Mr. Labouchere, especially as recent letters appearing in different journals show that the challenge thrown down is in a fair way towards being accepted. Has the cause descended so low that the arena of a betting-ring is to become the modus operandi for settling disputed phenomena? Have we really, as Spiritualists, sunk so low as to prostitute these gifts before an uncompromising and materialistic age? Will not so candid and truth-seeking a man as Signor Damiani see this when it is fairly stated? Is it possible that the honoured and revered Mr. S. C. Hall will again give expression to the sentiments which recently appeared in your journal? Rather let us remain under the stigma of delusionists and visionaries than submit to an ordeal which can only have the tendency to leave the passions of the multitude still more inflamed, without a corresponding good result in the furtherance of the cause! Rather let us remain the receivers and not the exhibitors of forces and powers which the wisest amongst us are incapable of definitely comprehending, understanding, or solving! If the combined forces of Spiritualists and sceptics, possessing more of this world's pecuniary gifts than is necessary for them, are desirous of perpetuating their names and influence, they can do it in a more practical form than that contemplated, by administering the fund to be staked towards the alleviation of the misery endured by the children of the indigent poor. Two thousand pounds from each side would go far towards establishing kitchens to be attached to many of our Board schools in different parishes, and afford cheap dinners to those who are compulsorily scantily clothed and ill-fed.

Rest assured, sir, the fact that the movement is so ill-received at present by a large section of a cold and unsympathising public is not without a purpose. The seed now being sown will spread, fructify, and ripen in good time—not at the bidding of a betting fraternity, of one or any number of individuals; not to gratify the whims and caprices of individuals of fashion, who court it in too many instances simply as an amusement for the hour. In many cases the would-be scoffer receives something which, like the electric spark, strikes home; and the scientist, with all his boasted knowledge and profound research, cannot, in face of these facts, determine that certain laws go so far and no farther. To such I would quote the lines in Gray's "Elegy":—

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene," &c., &c.

But of such as these the movement is independent; and its powers, forces, and phenomena are given, received, and felt far more often in the lowly cottage than the patrician's hall. Without reserve, it imparts to all, to none more especially than to those who seek. Held up to ridicule, its adherents subjected to the vilest slander and persecutions, its votaries classed as "rogues," "cheats," "vagrabonds," it still rears its head, and in the words of Galileo after his recantation before a Roman Inquisition we can truly say "E pur se muove!" ("It still moves for all that!")—I am, sir, yours obediently,

The Testimonial to Mr. J. J. Morse.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in forwarding you a completed list of subscribers. R. A., £3; F. G. S., £5; A Friend, £2; Liverpool Friends, £3 10s.; T. Everitt, Esq., 10s. 6d.; The Misses Ponder, £2; T. Amos, Esq., £1 1s.; Anonyma, 5s.; A Friend, per Mr. D. Younger, £10; Joseph Swinburne, £1 1s.; Glasgow Friends, per Mr. J. Robertson, £5; L. W., £1 5s.; Glasgow Friends (2nd donation), £1 5s. With my very best thanks on behalf of Mr. J. J. Morse, to all those friends who have so kindly and generously responded to my appeal.—Yours faithfully,

FRANK EVERITT.

25, Penton-street,
January 13th, 1885.

OUR German contemporary, Die Spiritualistische Blätter, is more occupied with the progress of the movement in England and America than in Germany. A materialisation medium, Emil Schnapps, is, however, attracting attention at Hamburg, where it still seems usual to bind and secure the medium in various ingenious ways. On one occasion, however, Emil Schnapps was seated, unbound, in the corner of an absolutely empty room, the spectators forming a half-circle before him. After about ten minutes a shining ball of phosphorus arose from the head of the medium. It ascended to nearly the height of the ceiling and there divided into two, then three, portions, each of which wandered independently about the room, touching the various spectators. In some cases two persons, seated at opposite sides of the room, were touched together. Then a heavy musical clock rose playing into the air, and wandered, performing colossal beats, over the heads of the circle. A sceptic rashly struck a light, whereupon the medium was seen seated pale and cold on his chair as at the beginning. Knockings and a sound like a detonating signal were heard, and so the sitting closed.

THE LEGAL DISABILITIES ATTACHED TO SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATION.

The Whitchall Review, wise in its generation, and discerning in a measure, the signs of the times, has awoke to the fact that "the believers in Spiritualism" are "an influential body of people." Whether we accept this statement literally or not, it is undeniable that the investigators of occult phenomena are very numerous, and as their purpose is simply and solely the discovery and diffusion of the truth, it surely behoves them to realise their legal status, and, if necessary, to take such steps as may be desirable to remove the disabilities under which they labour.

The question is one that concerns every Spiritualist, and every student of psychical science; and as, at no distant date, it may be necessary for them to use what "influence" they possess in a public agitation, our remarks, which are only intended to introduce the question and to state it in popular terms, may not, at this time, be out of place. "Forewarned is Forearmed."

In this connection let us for the present confine our attention to one phase of the weird and mysterious phenomena usually called "Spiritual," that of abnormal writing, or writing executed without the intervention of any person or power visibly present; and we refer to this phenomenon chiefly because, since the experiments made in the presence of Mr. Gladstone, it is the one which has excited the greatest amount of interest and attention. That writing is so given, in the presence of certain persons, known as psychics, or more popularly as mediums, has been witnessed and testified by many hundreds of people in every rank of life, including men eminent in science, whose capacity for observation would not be disputed in relation to any other matter. Nor is it possible to imagine that they were deceived by the arts of prestidigitation, seeing that some of the most skilful conjurers of the age, including Robert Houdin, Professor Jacobs, Samuel Bellachini (Court Conjurer at Berlin), Harry Kellar, and others, after patiently investigating the phenomena, have declared them to be totally beyond the resources of the art of prestidigitation.

This being so, as we know it to be from numberless experiments, it is surely of the first importance that we should be free to pursue our investigations with the view to determine the laws which govern the production of the writing and the nature and source of the power by which it is given. And yet our inquiries, if not prevented, are from time to time somewhat impeded, by threats of prosecution; because, forsooth, some old Act of Parliament, manifestly never intended for such cases, has been, and may again be, so construed to apply. We refer, of course, to Section 4 of 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, commonly known as the Vagrant Act, which provides that "any person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive or impose on any of his Majesty's subjects" shall be punished on conviction by imprisonment with hard labour.

Now we protest emphatically against any attempt to suppress the search after truth—in whatever realm, natural or supernatural, the truth expressed in these phenomena may lie—by an appeal to the strong arm of the law; and if the Act to which we have referred is fairly open to such abuse, then it is high time that it should be repealed. But we maintain that the Act is so interpreted only because our magistrates and judges know nothing whatever of the matter with which they may be called upon to deal. The clause makes it penal to profess to tell fortunes; but every person who is at all familiar with this phenomenon knows that the medium makes no such profession. Questions, which the medium has no means of seeing, may be written on the inside of a folding slate, which having been locked, writing is heard going on within while the slate is still locked, and of the nature of the answer the medium knows nothing, just as he knew nothing of the question. If the observer is foolish enough to ask what horse will win the Derby, or will inquire as to the health of the Pope, the medium is equally irresponsible. He has no conscious part in the proceedings, and is as greatly puzzled as the veriest tyro to explain by what means the writing is accomplished.

Again, the Act makes it unlawful to use any subtle craft, means, or device to deceive or impose on, &c. But the medium uses no subtle craft, means, or device. He is simply there to afford the evidence that in his presence there is an abnormal, intelligent power—which he does not use, and over which he has no control—and which can and does write, between locked slates, even in broad daylight, the writing being heard in the process of execution. To those who have witnessed the phenomenon it is obvious enough that this abnormal writing is a fact, however inexplicable it may be, and that there is no attempt whatever at deception; and we assert, therefore, that it is a flagrant perversion of justice, and a scandalous disgrace, to punish a man by imprisonment because he happens to be the centre of certain phenomena which are, as Mr. Flowers once spoke of them, "contrary to the known course of nature," meaning, no doubt, contrary to the course of nature so far as Mr. Flowers knows it.

We have spoken above of genuine mediums. That there may be charlatans we do not doubt. Let such be punished, and punished severely, by all means. If a man professes to be a medium in whose presence certain occult phenomena occur without active co-operation on his part, and if he is caught red-handed in simulating such phenomena, and thus in attempting to deceive or impose upon her Majesty's subjects, scarcely any punishment can be too severe for him. None will witness his exposure with more satisfaction than we shall.

SIGNOR DAMIANI AND MR. LABOUCHERE.

The letters from the Pall Mall Gazette, reprinted below, are the result of Signor Damiani's "Challenge" to Mr. Labouchere, the details of which appeared in our last issue. The correspondence speaks for itself, and we reprint it in these columns more as a matter of "history" than from any sympathy with such a method of testing truth, or from any belief that it will lead to a tangible result, much less prove of real benefit to the cause of Spiritualism. Indeed, we have, on more than one occasion, deprecated such appeals, at the same time confessing as a deplorable fact that the argument which touches the pocket is the only one that counts in many quarters now-a-days. But the principle involved is, nevertheless, a bad one; and experience has shown that even at the best of times, and under the most favourable conditions, these "challenges" lead to, and prove—nothing!

By these strictures we do not wish to imply the least lack of appreciation of Signor Damiani's motives in thus publicly attesting his confidence in his own powers of observation and the integrity of Mr. Eglinton. None who know him can doubt that he is actuated by the purest sincerity of purpose, and a simple whole-hearted desire to serve Spiritualism to the best of his ability. But while recognising these facts, fidelity to what we believe to be the true interests of the movement forbids us to blind our eyes to another fact—viz., that his offer, generous and spontaneous though it be, can only tend, and that through no fault of his, to the degradation and prostitution of our cause.

The true standpoint is, to our minds, that taken by Mr. Eglinton in his admirable and dignified reply to Mr. Stuart Cumberland, which, however, seems to have been lost sight of. He said (we quote in full for convenience sake):—

"In the second place, I cannot consent that any of the parties to an investigation should, even voluntarily, be pledged to the forfeit of £1,000 in the event of the decision being against them. They would be more than human if the mere possibility of such a forfeit did not, even unconsciously to themselves, in some measure dim their eyes against the recognition of an unwelcome truth.

"What I propose is this—that a committee of six be appointed, three to be chosen by myself and three by—I do not care by whom, so that they are gentlemen of good reputation and have not committed themselves to a hostile attitude before the experiments are commenced. I will meet this committee at any place that may be mutually agreed upon, and they shall be at liberty to provide their own slates. But as I am not a conjurer, as the phenomena do not come at my command, and as I do not use 'any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise,' the committee shall agree to meet on six separate occasions before they shall conclude that the experiments are futile. If the experiments succeed they shall report the fact to Mr. Cumberland; shall call upon him, in accordance with his promise, to 'explain away such demonstrations by natural means to the satisfaction of the committee'; and shall require him to produce the same phenomena, observing the same conditions, as were produced and observed in my presence."

This we believe to be the true ground to take. It is equitable to all; and, moreover, takes the question out of the region of quackery in which Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Stuart Cumberland would be only too glad to keep it. A perusal of the former gentleman's subsequent letters to the Pall Mall Gazette will show the attitude of mind in which he approaches the subject. If Signor Damiani thinks he can trust such a man to coolly and patiently search for the truth in this matter we fear he is mistaken. We give the letters in the order in which they appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette.

Since writing the above Professor Ray Lankester has also contributed his share (see p. 32) to the correspondence. If anything were needed to confirm our views, surely his letter would be ample. He has thereby posted himself on the Black Book of Science in company with Mr. R. A. Proctor and Mr. Labouchere. It is well that the fact should be placed on record, together with his avowal of the methods he desiderates—amongst others, sailing under false colours and physical force!

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—I have not received the letter from Professor G. Damiani, copy of which appears in your issue to-day, but I shall be delighted to accept his challenge, provided that we can agree upon conditions and upon a jury. If Professor Damiani and I were both to appoint four gentlemen to form the jury, it might possibly happen there would be no verdict; it would also be desirable that we should agree upon the slates to be used, and upon proper precautions against the possibility of trickery, for I need hardly point out that the art oflegerdemain is to do a trick in such a manner that the modus operandi is not perceived. Professor Ray Lankester is a gentleman of great scientific and practical acumen, and he has always shown an interest in investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism. I would suggest that Professor Damiani should agree upon a jury and upon conditions with Professor Lankester. Anything which satisfies him will satisfy me, and I shall then be quite ready to deposit my £1,000 against the £1,000 of Professor Damiani, my sole object being to prevent a lengthy discussion about conditions ending in smoke, and to have the issue raised in the presence of gentlemen able by their training to guard against fraud; for without adopting the dictum that no amount of human evidence can prove a miracle, all will, I think, admit that the fact that inhabitants of the immaterial world are in the habit of writing messages and drawing pictures on material slates placed under tables is only likely to be credited upon the most incontrovertible and most experienced evidence.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

10, Queen Anne's-gate,
January 8th.

H. LABOUCHERE.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—Even before reading it in your issue of this evening I was made aware of Mr. Labouchere's acceptance of my challenge, as I had learned it from a gentleman of the Press who came early in the morning to interview me. Mr. Labouchere says that if we each appointed four gentlemen to form a jury it might possibly happen there would be no verdict. I do not think so, for if Mr. Labouchere appoints four English gentlemen on his side, such is my opinion of the honour of an English gentleman that I am sure that one of them will at least decide for what is right, true, and just. Mr. Labouchere proposes that Professor Ray Lankester should meet me to agree upon a jury and upon conditions. Nothing will give me greater pleasure than to accede to Mr. Labouchere's request. Let it be clearly understood, however, that, although Professor Lankester is the fit man to propose the strictest test conditions for a trial of that sort, I must decidedly object to him or any other man acting on the jury who has already given publicly a verdict against the possibility of abnormal phenomena. In a letter I have just received from Mr. Labouchere, in answer to one I had written to him, he seems to object to my having Spiritualists on the jury. What would he say if I objected to his having Materialists on his side? Of course I shall have Spiritualists as sure as he will have Materialists to compose the jury. The question is not one of opinion, but one of fact. If under the strictest scientific conditions, with double slates bought by Mr. Labouchere himself, locked or sealed by him, and never lost from view of the jury, writing is found within them, what matters the previous opinion of any jury if composed of honest men who have not given already an adverse verdict founded upon incomplete observation? Surely such a logician as Mr. Labouchere will not gainsay the reasonableness of this proposition. Awaiting Mr. Labouchere and Professor Ray Lankester's pleasure, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

G. DAMIANI.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—In reply to Professor Damiani's letter in your issue of to-day, I most certainly should object to a jury half composed of Spiritualists. A judge might just as soon agree to the state of mind of a supposed lunatic being tried by a jury half composed of madmen. I never suggested that there should be Materialists—by which I presume Professor Damiani means men who deny the possibility of the existence of anything beyond matter —on the jury. A conjurer's art is to deceive the eye. Whether a result is produced by jugglery or by ghosts can only be decided by those who, by their acquaintance with jugglers' tricks and by special training, are able to detect fraud. It is to such a jury that I would submit the slate-writing "phenomenon." Professor Damiani is not apparently aware that some years ago one Slade practised this trick and deceived many by it. After being condemned here by a London magistrate as a rogue and a vagabond, for he was caught in the act of writing himself on the slate, he finally went to Canada, where he confessed his imposture. No one, therefore, is likely to credit the pretensions of a new slate-writing "professor"—unless he performs his "phenomenon" in the presence of those able to detect imposture. The reason why so many believe in ghosts flapping about rooms and writing on slates is that few are able to perceive the manner in which a conjuring trick is performed, and they fancy that because of this what they see is not conjuring but something supernatural. And yet they have only to go to one or two performances of Mr. Maskelyne to see tricks which they cannot explain, and yet which are not performed by supernatural agency.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

January 10th.

H. LABOUCHERE.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—Allow me to make a suggestion with reference to the Spiritualistic challenge. As Mr. Labouchere observes, if the committee is to consist of four gentlemen chosen by himself and four by Mr. Damiani, there will probably be no verdict. With £2,000 at stake, plus prejudices, agreement among friends of the opposite parties is scarcely under any circumstances to be expected. I would therefore suggest, first, that there should be no money stake; the public are already sufficiently assured of a genuine antagonism without so heavy a premium on failure of the contest. Next I would suggest that, over and above the committee chosen by the opposite sides, there should be admitted a limited number of more independent witnesses. These might be chosen by ballot from among volunteers belonging to some such representative body as the Royal Society, a sufficient number of the Fellows of which would probably send in their names to furnish at least half-a-dozen unbiassed opinions. The report of such witnesses would have much more influence on the public mind than a verdict of "not proven" by the proposed committee. Even if the money stake were to stand, these independent witnesses might still be admitted, when the function of the committee would resolve itself into deciding what is to become of the stake.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ANTI-SPIRITUALIST.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—Mr. Labouchere, in his communication of the 10th inst., says that to admit four Spiritualists upon the jury in the matter of slate-writing would be to have a jury half composed of madmen to agree on the sanity of a supposed lunatic. He further avers that he never proposed his jury to consist of Materialists. In reply I would say that if the four jurors on his own side were chosen by him they could not be anything but matter and force men, and I might add that I objected to them as a judge would to a jury composed half of blind men to judge of colours. Yet I did not make any exception about the state of mind of Mr. Labouchere's jury, provided they were men of honour, the which I promise to do on my side. I will go further in my concessions. I will not object to see on Mr. Labouchere's jury those princes of conjurers Maskelyne and Cooke. There! Would that we were now at the end of the difficulties.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

G. DAMIANI.

[Mr. Damiani sends us a long vindication of Slade, denying that Slade has ever "avowed his imposture," and offering to send Mr. Labouchere Massey's translation of Zollner's "Transcendental Physics," in which he says he will find the truth about Slade fully and correctly set forth.]

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—I am much obliged to Messrs. Cumberland, Labouchere, and Damiani for the expression of confidence in me contained in their recent letters to you. I have, however, no intention of taking part in their enterprise, because I consider that any such proceedings as they propose are at the best a waste of time, and may very possibly lead to fallacious results. For my own part, I should no more think of proposing a wager to Sludge, the medium, in regard to the honesty of his performance than I should think of making a similar proposition to a pickpocket. Sludge has been convicted in the police-courts over and over again. He is a curious and unsavoury specimen of natural history, and if you wish to study him, you must take him unawares, as you would any other vermin. You cannot catch him at his little games if you plainly tell him that you have your eyes open and mean to watch him closely. In order to see him at work and in his glory, you must lull his suspicions to sleep; you must draw him out by making him believe that you are his dupe, whilst the stupid fellow exposes one after another his clumsy artifices to your unsuspected gaze. This highly entertaining sport cannot be enjoyed on many occasions. I have had my turn at it with that "thoroughly game old medium" Slade, whom I "caught in the act," and by the aid of Bow-street Police-court drove from this country. Any one who will take the pains can, I have no doubt, have the same amusing experience with Eglinton. The great point to remember is that as a Cambridge Little-go examiner once remarked to me concerning cribbing, "It is easy enough to stop 'em; any one can do that. The thing is to catch 'em at it; that's really a hard business. I've caught six in my time." It seems to me that all your challenges and wagers and juries in this matter can only result, if the precautions taken are thorough-going, in stopping the medium from "exhibiting his powers." This proves nothing. What one wants is, to have the "phenomena" fully and freely exhibited by the medium. To do this one must assume the garb of a believer. Then at the appropriate moment, when one has thoroughly and leisurely examined the "phenomena," one introduces "a new factor"—for example, cochineal, a light, a blow from the fist or a firm grasp of the hand; and immediately the "phenomena" are demonstrated beyond all doubt to be the cunning devices of the unsavoury Sludge. I have done my share of the skunk-hunting, let others follow.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

E. RAY LANKESTER.

January 12th.

The following letter was sent to the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, but did not appear:—

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Labouchere's letter in your issue of to-day's date in reply to Signor Damiani. With the objections which he raises to that gentleman's proposals as to the composition of the jury, I do not propose to deal. That is a matter which they must settle between themselves. My purpose now is to call attention to an error into which Mr. Labouchere has fallen in respect to Slade, and which shows plainly the attitude of his (Mr. Labouchere's) mind towards the subject, and the ignorance under which he writes. It is quite true that Dr. Slade was condemned by Mr. Flowers as "a rogue and vagabond" because under the state of the law Mr. Flowers had no other alternative; but it is not true that Slade was caught in the act of writing himself on the slate. That was a conclusion which, for want of experience on the part of the magistrate and the prosecutors, was arrived at without any just ground whatever. Because Dr. Slade was seized, and the writing had been partly accomplished, it was simply assumed that he had himself done it. Experience amongst those who take the trouble to investigate the matter carefully and patiently has abundantly shown that there was no evidence against Slade whatever. And it is not true, moreover, as Mr. Labouchere states, that Dr. Slade finally went to Canada and there "confessed his imposture." Dr. Slade never did confess his imposture, as there was no imposture to confess. In his anxiety to damage an innocent man, Mr. Labouchere has confounded Dr. Slade with one who, assuming the same name, went about imitating the same phenomena, and was, I believe, detected in his swindle. It is gross misrepresentations of this kind of which Spiritualists so justly complain.

Yours truly,

THE EDITOR OF "LIGHT."

"M.A. (Oxon)"—We are again unable to render a satisfactory account of "M.A. (Oxon)". He leaves his bed only to have it made, and is in continual torture from gout, which flies about in every part of the system. We can only reiterate, on behalf of our readers, our earnest sympathy and desire for his recovery. Personally, we very much miss his active co-operation and advice.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XII.

Mr. E. Foster, of Preston, a really model Spiritualist, who loses no opportunity of bringing other world facts before the people who might, could, would, or should be interested in them, has a long letter, full of the strongest testimony, in a recent number of the Preston Chronicle, which he prefaces with the following suggestive quotations:—

The thirst for the infinite proves infinity.—VICTOR HUGO.

Facts have been denied with a heat and pertinacity that I could never understand.—SIR CHAS. BELL.

The advent of Spiritualism is through facts and not theories. Its purpose is positive knowledge.—HUDSON TUTTLE.

A presumptuous scepticism that rejects facts without examination of their truth is, in some respects, more injurious than unquestioning credulity.—HUMBOLDT.

Up to the time when I first became acquainted with the facts of Spiritualism, I was a confirmed philosophical sceptic. Facts, however, beat me and compelled me to accept them as facts long before I could accept the spiritual explanation of them.—ALFRED R. WALLACE, F.R.S.

In the whole universe all is contingent; nothing is unnecessary; nothing the cause of itself. To explain the causes of all, therefore, we must admit a cause which may be necessarily a cause of itself and of all things. This cause being, since it is necessary, it follows that God is, for it is God.—LEIBNITZ.

In his letter Mr. Foster describes two physical facts observed by himself and his friends in his library; viz.—the passage through the closed and barricaded doors of his book-case, of three large volumes and a heavy roll of paper, which were brought and laid upon the table round which he and his friends were sitting. He offered Professor Tyndall 500 guineas to explain this phenomenon scientifically, or show how it could be done. This is a perfectly fair offer—but, of course, Professor Tyndall would scorn to even look at 500 guineas.

Mr. Foster is, like the late Mr. Fowler of Liverpool, a thoroughly responsible man—and he makes a similar offer and double the amount to Professor Huxley. The Professor has said that the only case of Spiritualism he ever explained was a gross imposture—as one might say the only bank note he ever took was a counterfeit. Mr. Foster says:—

"Let him try again, as Surgeon-General Wolseley did a few weeks ago, and as the Premier did still more recently, and if he do receive entire satisfaction, as I am confident he will, then undertake to do the same afterwards, and tell us how it is done, he can have 1,000 guineas for his trouble. Now, gentlemen—Professors Tyndall and Huxley—you have a chance of securing 1,500 guineas between you. Surely that will compensate for the time and trouble involved in conducting your experiments; and when you have done the above I shall be glad to submit a variety of others of a still more perplexing character."

Here is no question of a wager, but the offer of a generous reward to two men of science for information they ought to be most happy to furnish. Needless to say that were the offer £1,000,000 it would no more be claimed than the 1,500 guineas, because, with a few most honourable exceptions, men of science have "made up their minds," and no number of adverse facts will ever change them.

What with offers of gifts and challenges for a thousand pounds, Spiritualism is becoming almost as interesting as boxing or horse-racing! Doubtless, some look upon this mixing up of money with the phenomena which demonstrates the reality of the spirit life as a desecration. "Thy money perish with thee," quotes one noted champion of the cause—but would any one like to say that to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who gets £15,000 a-year for performing spiritual functions?

The offers of rewards of hundreds or thousands of pounds by well-known Spiritualists for the reproduction of spiritual phenomena by "exposers" under the same conditions that they occur in the presence of mediums, have never been accepted. There has not been the least effort in that direction. Fancy Mr. Maskelyne undertaking to write within a locked slate answers to Mr. Gladstone's three questions in Italian, Spanish, and Greek, when he was utterly ignorant of each language!

Or this, which I have seen done on several occasions with

Mr. Eglinton. A blank card is placed between two slates, the sitter places his two hands upon them, and is then asked: "What do you desire to be written?" He says: "A message to myself in German, French, Italian, Greek"—as the case may be. Still holding the slate firmly under his hand he hears the writing being done. Raising the upper slate he finds a message addressed to him in the language he had selected. Will any "exposer" do that for a year's salary of the Archbishop of Canterbury?

Or take this case which occurred recently to the present writer. Wishing for information in a personal matter which no one in this life could give me, I went to Mr. Eglinton and privately wrote three strictly private and personal questions on his double slate, and locked it. Under my hands I heard the sound of writing, and found, in a handwriting perfectly familiar to me, the answers to my three questions.

An avowed Materialist like Mr. Labouchere can only say "It is impossible. It is contrary to the unchanging laws of nature. It would be a miracle, and there are no such things as miracles. Those who pretend to have them are impostors, and those who believe in them are idiots. All Spiritualists are either knaves or fools." And Mr. Labouchere is quite willing to bet 1,000 pounds to prove it, if he can have Professor Ray Lankester to choose the jury.

The writers in some of the Evangelical periodicals take very different ground from that of the Materialists of the type of the two members for Northampton. "A Layman," replying to the "Spirit Teachings" of "M. A. (Oxon)" says:—

"There is no difference in character whatever between any of the spirits—they are all cast in the same mould, all have the same object in view—the ruin of the souls of men: however much their tactics may vary in details, in their pursuits thereof

'The air they breathe is every atom cursed,

There's no degree of ill, for all is worst.'

And this is the keynote to the whole question, the means by which we can alone elucidate the question."

So he goes on to elucidate by the repetition of his declaration that all the manifestations are diabolical.

Real, but diabolical. Undoubtedly genuine, but as undoubtedly the work of the devil, and a clear proof of his existence and power. Fancy old Clotey writing Greek between two locked slates to entrap the soul of Mr. Gladstone. Of course, God Who made the devil allows him to do all this mischief. If I were to permit a crime to be committed which I could prevent, I should be held responsible.

Nothing is gained by attributing the mischief of Spiritualism to the devil. Infinite power and wisdom carry infinite responsibility. To say that God "permits" evil is an evasion. He who creates is completely responsible for all the results of His creation. Poor Friday asked Robinson Crusoe why God did not kill the devil. Why did God make him? would be a more reasonable question.

Qui fecit per alium fecit per se. If in God "we live and move and have our being," the same must be true of all intelligences, good or evil; so that nothing is gained by attributing slate-writing to Satan, and our pious friends had better sail on another tack. Suppose the manifestations are diabolical, why denounce that which proves the existence of the devil, which all infidels deny? If any of your friends deny it, all you have to do is to take them to Mr. Eglinton, or any good medium, and have his existence demonstrated.

Do the diabolists really think that the devil is fool enough to show his horns and hoof when he can just as easily "transform himself into an angel of light," and deceive, if it were possible, the very elect—perhaps even the denouncers of Spiritualism in the Evangelical papers?

The Banner of Light gives two curious statements regarding Mr. Mansfield, an American writing medium, who gets answers to sealed letters addressed to spirit friends, sent to him by people all over the world. He says he sat fifty-three times with his wife, an hour at each séance, before he was controlled to write. One of his latest feats was to give in public a verbatim copy of a letter from Ohio, carefully enclosed and the seal unbroken, while it was in the pocket of the gentleman to whom it was sent.

THE SPIRIT OF PUBLIC DISCUSSION OF SPIRITUALISM.

Recently, in a paper misnamed Truth, there appeared a notice of a materialisation séance, in which truth was made conspicuous by its absence. Were it worth while every paragraph in which an alleged fact is stated could be challenged, and every sneer turned upon the person who wrote it, but this controversy would be futile.

I wish to refer more particularly to another platform of discussion where we, who are Christians as well as Spiritualists, might look for better things—I mean where Spiritualism is brought forward for calm consideration in a literary society connected with a Christian assembly. In the present frenzied state of the Church in relation to everything spiritualistic, it is wisest, I think, to avoid theories as much as possible and keep to facts. Scientific men claim, rightly, to argue from the known to the unknown, but they wrongly desire, I think, to make an addendum of the word lives: if they would accept facts, sufficiently proved, and base their conclusions on them, they would then come to truths which must be accounted for, and would possibly discover by such a mode of research other laws not yet recognised by science, but which are recognised in the domain of faith. In the Church we ask for more science; in the scientific world for more faith!

In a recent discussion on "Ghosts," Mr. Podmore, invited by a Literary Society of which I am a member, ably represented the Society for Psychical Research, and moved the following resolution:—

"That the latest scientific investigation clearly proves the existence of Ghosts," and in doing so, stated the present position of matters, which, as far as I could gather (he will correct me if I am wrong), is this: they have discovered that there is a substratum of truth in the almost universal belief in ghosts, but up to the point they have as yet gone to, the ghosts are subjective, and not objective, i.e., people see ghosts of their own creation. There may be rare instances of an objective ghost, but they are in the shade! And thus far have also the Theosophists arrived, with the addition of a shell or astral body, which we can assist to approach us by giving subjective conditions, only, however, to retard the spirit in its career towards Nirvana. This theory gives a material power over spirits which Christians will be the last to admit.

After Mr. Podmore had spoken, I ventured into the arena as the champion of ghosts! although the term draws us rather into the night side of the subject in which we Spiritualists are interested. I gave three cases from my own personal experience. The first case partook somewhat of the character ascribed to them by Mr. Podmore, but case No. 2 was an instance of a more real ghost, one seen only by sensitives. It haunted a cottage in the country when I first entered it, and objected to my being there. We had a séance at the cottage under spirit direction, and the ghost came and spoke through our entranced medium. The story of the education of this spirit in seeking the higher life and of its ceasing to annoy my sensitive visitors, is a long, interesting history. He was seen by four clairvoyants at different times, none of whom were told of his existence previously, and one gentleman, a sensitive, was startled by the ghost having materialised a hand and arm which he thrust out from under the dressing-table as he was standing in front of the toilet-glass; that being the only instance in which he became visible, except to our medium, who had talks and parleys with him many times; but, of course, this was shady by the side of the hand and arm which my friend saw. This ghost has since risen to a higher life. He came recently to one of our séances at home, and was announced by our little spirit daughter as "having come with a new dress," whiter, because his character was improved. In a few minutes he further proved his presence by writing the following letter, or rather by having it written for him by another spirit well-known to us, he scrawling his signature to it.

The letter I read to the meeting, handing it round for inspection, and here it is. Upon the same sheet of paper are three other direct spirit-written letters, each in different styles of writing and signed by the various spirits writing them. The paper bears a private mark of my own, by which I identified it at the time as having been blank a few minutes before. The following is a copy of the ghost's letter:—

"DEAR SIR AND MADAM,—You will be glad to know I am improving, and with God's help I will continue to do so. All is well at—; my dress is changing. I am going up higher. I shall not be able to be so often at the old house, but may come sometimes. God bless you all for what you have done for me. Thank Mary, your medium, for first showing me light in my darkness. Farewell for a time.

"B—, by J. W. E."

I may remark that his presence, which was at first objectionable, was recently quite the reverse, and his interest in our family life was shown one night rather ludicrously. Mary was rubbing my daughter's cheek outside with toothache pencil, when B— appeared to Mary (not to N.) and spoke: "That be'ant no good, put it on the jar!" which Mary interpreted aright as jaw, and so applied it, with success.

Now I consider that ghost pretty well proved, especially with the addition of other details I here omit in consideration for space.

The third case was the one already recorded in these columns on the 13th December, the account of which I read from print. This one was seen by eight and recognised by four of those present; it shook hands also with myself and was a real substantial ghost! or spirit, as I prefer to call him.

I had previously asked this spirit to give me a direct writing to show to the meeting, and on the morning of the day, at 8 a.m., I found on my study table a long message, filling three pages, signed by him and written on marked paper, which was certainly blank overnight. In the midst of it occurs the following, which I should rely on, among other things, as proof to an inquirer of the spirit origin of the writing, no one in the house knowing Greek, and no one having access to my room, which was locked, until it was found.

"DEAR FRIENDS,—We, who are passed away, all take a new name in our new home. Read Rev. μεν πρώτον Ουτω έαυτον επικαλει επειδαν δε διεφερε και εβη ηρ βελους Οδυσσαν ονομαζεσθαι εφη.

"The English of this I shall leave you wise ones to find out.

dictated a great part by E. M.

This spirit in life-time knew Greek; the word under-scored my end ea, but I cannot quite determine how to read it.

But to come to the pith of this paper. There are certainly some remarkable facts stated above, and detailed at greater length to the meeting, which one would have thought should have been met on their own ground. But it seems to me the usual thing is for the speaker, in polite terms, to be called either a fool or a liar. One of my dearest friends got up and spoke thus:—

"We all know Mr. Theobald, his word is above suspicion, and we know he is speaking what he believes to be the truth," &c., &c. So far so good; but then he added how he once produced simulations of the phenomena; and another one told us how he and a party met for the very purpose of trying to cheat one another, and "that is how it is done!"

This kind of twaddle, and also another favourite mode of reply by raising up ghosts and then knocking down such self-made ghosts (very easy and very amusing, no doubt), are

AN UNDENIABLE FACT.

Under this heading Mr. J. J. Owen published an interesting letter in the Religio-Philosophical Journal of July 26th, 1884. He related his experiences as follows:—

"Twelve years ago I numbered among my intimate friends a distinguished Senator of California, who also had a flourishing banking business at San Jose. He was a deep thinker, a man of decisive judgment, but a hard materialist. He believed with Job that all consciousness ceased with the grave, and hence also the individual life. Dr. Knox was a frequent and always a welcome visitor in my study, where Spiritualism was mostly the theme of our discourse, and I could only oppose to his sharp logic my own actual experiences and those of others. Gradually he felt the end of his days approaching, for he suffered from a slow developing lung disease. He often spoke trustfully of the everlasting sleep which awaited him, with its eternal forgetfulness; nor did he experience any fear of dying. On one of these occasions I said to him, 'Doctor, although you are certain that you have solved the riddle of your future existence, I, on the other hand, am equally convinced that you will one day see your error and become conscious that another life begins beyond the grave; let us, therefore, come to an understanding, that if you find yourself alive there, you will, if possible, communicate with me in these few words, 'I still live.' He earnestly made me this promise, assuring me that he should feel it a solemn duty to impart this knowledge to mortals before their death.

"A few months after, the faithful friend had 'passed over' bravely and peacefully. He died, as he had lived, without hope and fear as to the future. Three years passed away without my finding an opportunity of 'proving the spirits.' Knox also seemed in no wise moved to 'give a sign.' Meanwhile a younger brother of his passed away and soon returned as the chief control for direct slate-writing of the medium, Mrs. Clara L. Reid, who now lives at San Francisco. I was becoming extremely anxious to hear something of the dead friend, the more so when once a materialisation medium came from the East, whom I knew to be genuine. This medium told me that he was sometimes allowed by his control to give proofs through the direct slate-writing, and would attempt it for my benefit.

"This offer I thankfully accepted. I cleaned a slate, put a morsel of pencil on it, and pressed it under the leaf of the table. The medium placed one of his hands over mine under the table, and the other on the upper surface of the table. After a few minutes we heard some gentle raps. My thoughts were meanwhile fixed on my dead friend, and I asked if the knocking came from him. The reply was one stroke, the well-known signal for 'No.' I next asked the spirit to communicate by means of the alphabet. Three raps followed, and the word 'Knox' was spelt out. Then we heard the sound of writing, and I found on the slate the following:—

"'Friend Owen! The facts which nature shows us are irresistible, and the would-be wise philosopher struggles often with one who disturbs his pet theories, and then leaves him to flounder about in a great sea of doubt and uncertainty. This was not exactly my case, for although my views as to a future life were unmercifully overthrown, yet I must acknowledge that my dis-illusion was an agreeable one, and that I rejoice to be able to say to you, my friend, 'I still live.'—Your friend as formerly, Wm. Knox."

"It must be observed that this medium only came to California three years after my friend's death; that he never knew him; also that the handwriting on the slate was so completely that of my dead friend that it was recognised as his at the bank of which he was president."

"RARE BITS" is giving "Glimpses of the Supernatural" every week, and does not hesitate to draw upon avowedly spiritualistic sources. In the last issue a narrative, first contributed to these columns, by our esteemed co-worker Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, is quoted with but slight abridgment.

not what we should expect from serious people. Yet this is what is received with rough guffaws and peals of laughter. Such methods we might expect from Truth, but not from intimate personal friends. The most serious attempt to reply to the fact of my having shaken hands with a spirit is that I was deceived! Well, I might have been, but how about the four others present who testified to the same thing? and if four are not enough, how many are sufficient to establish such a fact? And how about the Greek, which I am told is incorrect because μεν cannot stand first?

I apprehend the spirit can put it where it likes; and if it is suggested that it is copied, and μεν cannot in the original be found standing first, it seems to prove to me it is not copied.

Let me add that my transcription may be faulty by confusing ν and υ, which are not always clear in the original writing, and I am not Greek scholar enough to decide.

To return to the question of the amount of testimony necessary to establish a fact. There were two disciples only journeying to Emmaus, and their testimony that they saw Christ's risen body is accepted by the same people who refuse to accept the evidence of four to a similar fact; and if seven witnesses in my house testify to an unusual phenomenon, we are all very politely looked upon as non compos mentis!

Is this such a pleasant position for us to be placed in that we should be likely to covet it or even to bear our testimony for such fruits? If we could accept the theory of hallucination would it not be far simpler? But we dare not—we could not. We look to the truth to make us free. It is the old story of persecution on the advent of anything new, and an endeavour to put down by the strong arm of the law, civil or religious, for both are equally vindictive, God's new revelation to the world, given to a sceptical age which yearns for such proofs of an after life.

December 24th, 1884.

MORELL THEOBALD.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have had the following direct spirit-writing put into my drawer; it relates to the Greek quoted above:—

At first he was called Ουτις, but as soon as he had escaped, and was out of the javelin's reach he said he was named Οδυσσευς—Ulysses.

We meant by it, on earth we are known by only one name, but when we enter to our higher life we change or have a new name, and if you read Revelations you will see that all have a new name in the Lamb's Book of Life.

A BRADFORD gentleman (an inquirer) is anxious to meet some Spiritualists in the neighbourhood for advice and instruction. We shall be pleased if any of our correspondents can help in this case.

STUART CUMBERLAND left Berlin, writes a correspondent, with pockets well-filled by his séances in thought-reading and explanations of spirit-phenomena. His visit has done good; for many who were dissatisfied with his representations have added to the numbers of subscribers to the German Spiritualist journals.—Le Messenger.

"LA CONSTANCIA" OF BUENOS AYRES.—La Constancia is one of the established journals of the Allan Kardec school, which is turning more attention to what by that school is termed "Experimental Spiritualism." Its last number makes extracts from Facts, Peoria, U.S., among them the following:—Spirit Identity.—Mrs. Kate Stiles, of Boston, was at a séance, when a medium was controlled by a spirit who said, through her, that she was Mrs. Stiles' daughter: to identify herself she drew near her, asked her not to be alarmed; put her hand into Mrs. Stiles' pocket, drew out her pocket-book and picked out from it an obituary notice of herself, which Mrs. Stiles had cut out of a newspaper, and said, "See here, dear mother, the proof of what you have called my death." The medium was a stranger. "Her presence," continues Mrs. Stiles, "proved, however, the continuance of her life. She has since communicated to me through two other mediums, to my great joy."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstålbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ESOTERIC AND EXOTERIC BUDDHISM.

BY WILLIAM OXLEY.

The importance of the following remarks must be my justification for again bringing this subject before the readers of "LIGHT." In my former article I gave facts which showed what Buddhism really is in the countries where it has its home; and the question raised by a knowledge of the facts there adduced is, Does that system of religion give to its votaries a means conducive to their well-being in the life that now is, and elevate them in the scale of morality and intellectuality? Judging by the well-known saying "that a tree is known by its fruits," the response, from our point of view, can scarcely be favourable. What concerns us, whether as Christians, or Spiritualists, or truthseekers, is the claims that are advanced by the leaders of the Theosophical Society on behalf of the esoteric side of the Buddhist system of philosophy as being the repository of the "True Wisdom Religion," and also that its leaders and promoters are the custodians of all but absolute truth in relation to the Cosmos, &c. Whatever the Mahatmas themselves may be in their specific religious proclivities, it is an undoubted fact that the principal founders and active workers in the Theosophical movement are Buddhists pure and simple; and however wide the latitude given to the members of this Society for the upholding of their own specific religious, or other views, yet the Buddhist school of thought is held up as the purest and best, and far above any that is known to Western minds. It is this phase and this representation that chiefly concern us as searchers for pure and undefiled truth. The law of evolution has been at work, resulting in the elevation of human mentality—especially in Christendom—to a degree that the stagnant East neither understands nor appreciates; and from the Mahatmas downward all reckon without their host if they think that their claims and pretensions will pass unchallenged. So far as the Occident is concerned, the day has gone for ever in which dogmatic assumptions and declarations will pass for accepted truths and infallible wisdom. It is not now my object to deal with their doctrines, theories, and system of ethics; but rather to lift the veil, in order that the practical working of the Buddhist system in its headquarters may be seen and known.

I pointed out in my last article that the doctrine of the living Buddhas, by which is meant the re-incarnation of Buddha himself, in personal form continuously upon this earth, and others of lesser degree, is the corner-stone of the system.

The brilliant expositor of Mahatma Theosophy (Mr. Sinnett) does not leave us in any doubt on this matter, for he says (see "Esoteric Buddhism," p. 142), "the re-incarnations of the Dalai and Teshu Lamas in Thibet, at which travellers only laugh for want of the knowledge that might enable them to sift fact from fancy, is a sober scientific achievement." This is clear and unmistakable; and in other parts of the same chapter the learned author tells us how the re-incarnation is effected, by means of "the selection of a child-body," which, if true at all, is a worse edition of the cuckoo ejecting the hedge-sparrow, for in such a case it is ejecting the spirit which had built up a tenement for itself, and forcibly taking possession of the house built for another by its own labour. Surely Mr. Sinnett or his teachers must have overlooked this, or they would scarcely have presented the exemplification of the doctrine of the re-incarnation in this form. What conceivable right has the Lord Buddha, his successors, or the Adepts, to appropriate a living temple erected for, and by, another spirit atom of life, for their own specific manifestation and use? In such a case we cannot, and will not admit that the end justifies the means.

Apart from the truth, or otherwise, of the theory as put forth by the mouthpiece of the Mahatmas or Adepts, I now propose to supply details of the actual working of this doctrine, as it is exemplified in the persons of the Grand Lamas of Thibet, who are the Pontiffs of the Buddhist Church. In plain terms, I will give the other side of the picture, which is withheld, either from ignorance or design. According to the evidence which I now adduce, and which is open to challenge if it can be disproved, it is not the defunct Adept, or dying Buddha, who "selects the new child body" to re-incarnate in, but the Chinese Government! and, unless it is admitted that a secular and politic Government Council is gifted with a Divine wisdom, then it relegates the whole affair to a fraudulent imposition of the grossest kind. Strong as the judgment is, I leave it to the reader, after reading what follows, to say if it is any too strong.

As shown in my previous paper, and admitted by friend and foe alike, the grand central doctrine on which Buddhism as a system of thought and religion rests is, "The Living Buddhas," which means the continuous existence on this earth, by a succession of re-incarnations, of the Lord Buddha himself, and others of lesser note, as well as the Adepts. The issue is clearly drawn; and if it can be shown that this basic doctrine is questionable, and undemonstrable to fair criticism and scientific test, then it follows that the whole system, its philosophy included, is nothing more than speculation, and undeserving of acceptance by those who will and must have a standard of truth that is unassailable.

To any but partisans, and to those who have made themselves acquainted with the actual working of the system, the first surprise is to find how extremely modern it is, i.e., in relation to the now accepted faith in the continuous re-incarnations. What might have been known, or is alleged to have been known by the founder and his successors, it was not until about 1450 A.D. that it became the corner-stone of the system. It was then that Tsong-Ka-pa, who, Mr. Sinnett informs us, was the third incarnation of Guatama Buddha, appeared on the scene. Buddhist apologists say that this third re-incarnation of the Lord Buddha was for the purpose (in plain English) of reforming the occult fraternity, which at that period had lost much of its pristine occult vigour, if not morality. But an uninitiated conscientious historian, unacquainted with metaphysical subtleties, puts it down as a bold and so far successful attempt by this Church reformer, "to secure for the hierarchy of his own Church the perpetual succession of spiritual and temporal sovereignty."

It is unnecessary to treat of the history of Tibet, but it is sufficient to say that probably from time immemorial its capital and rulers have been to Buddhism what Rome is to the Christian system, and that the Grand Lamas are the Buddhistic Supreme Heads of the Church. In 1542 A.D., i.e., about 100 years after the era of Tsong-Ka-pa, the present Tatsing dynasty, having completed the conquest of China, turned their attention to Tibet, and the two then Grand Lamas tendered their allegiance, since which time the Government of Peking has retained the supreme tutelage of the Buddhistic hierarchy of Tibet. "Since the middle of the last century the Chinese Government placed the whole conduct of Tibetan affairs, both spiritual and temporal, into the hands of a council consisting of the two Grand Lamas and four laymen, under the supervision of two Chinese commissioners." What this involves will be seen presently, for the latter, representing the Chinese Government, are the real powers, both in Church and State, in Tibet, and even the two Grand Lamas are but mere puppets in their hands.

From what is advanced by Mr. Sinnett, as the advocate of the "sober scientific fact" of the re-incarnation of the Grand Lamas, who are presumed to be Adepts of the highest order, it would seem that the dying Buddhas "select their own child-bodies" for the purpose of re-incarnating themselves again into earth-life. But this is totally at variance with the real facts of the case, for the "selection" is by the Chinese Government, which is made from a greater or lesser number of claimants. It is impossible to square the two accounts, and the inference is obvious. The machinery employed for the discovery of the "selected child-body" is as follows:—"The selection is made from a large number of infants whose birth coincided with the death of the respective pontiff, provided that such birth was connected with auspicious signs favouring an artificial analogy with the spiritual characteristics of the vacant office. As the decision upon such analogies naturally produced disputes on each occasion, the Chinese Government easily managed to obtain the right of ultimate decision as to the eligible candidates for the vacant office."

But this is not all, for the astute Government of Peking is equal to any occasion where a difficult problem has to be solved by—policy! Perhaps the greatest surprise to the ordinary mind will be to discover that the ultimate decision of the "selected child-body" is determined by a lottery! which scheme was devised by the Chinese Emperor in 1792 A.D. The modus operandi is as follows:—"The infant 'candidates' brought forward by the priesthood, and their respective problematic claims to be an incarnation of the deceased dignitary, are submitted first to the Chinese Commissioners, who, in turn, refer the matter to the Peking Government, along with their recommendations. A large number of names are submitted, from which the Chinese Government select a few. These names are inscribed on wooden tablets, and deposited in a golden urn; and the child whose name is first drawn forth from the urn is forthwith, under public acclamation, solemnly enthroned by the clergy as the re-embodiment of the deceased dignitary."

In face of these facts, what becomes of the Esoteric theory that the Buddhas and Adepts "select their own child-bodies"? But the Government of the Chinese Celestial Empire goes further than this, for it claims the right to prevent any re-incarnations if it chooses so to do, for "some time ago the Chinese Government, wishing to abolish a certain high office in Tibet, did it, on the decease of the last occupant, by simply issuing an Imperial edict, actually published in the Peking Gazette, informing the Tibetan Pontiff that 'His Majesty the Emperor of China had been pleased to forbid the deceased dignitary for ever the privilege of reappearing again on earth in human form.'"

It is too great a draft on our credulity to credit the Chinese Government with any higher motives than State policy, and to suppose that the "selected child-body," after having run the gauntlet, first, of the priesthood; then of the two Chinese Commissioners; and again of the Government of Peking; and finally the turn up of the lottery bag—I say, if the original "selected child-body" by the dying Buddha, or Adepts, successfully passes through these ordeals and eventually should be the one known to the Adepts beforehand, it may be regarded as a miracle of miracles. Scepticism as to this cannot be regarded other than quite justifiable.

When the corruption, intrigues, conflicting claims of the "selected" infants, or their parents, which this wretched affair involves, are thus laid open to public scrutiny, who, amongst cultured and intelligent people, can regard the whole thing otherwise than as a scandalous imposition, perpetrated for the purpose of supporting the pretensions of an arrogant hierarchy?

I maintain, notwithstanding the attempts made by the advocates of Mahatma Theosophy to show to the contrary, that Exoteric Buddhism is the flowering out, or external manifestation, of what they are pleased to call Esoteric Buddhism; and that the one is to the other what the personality is to the individuality of the man or woman.

The "facts" which I have given show the straits that Exoteric Buddhism is reduced to, in order to give a plausible colouring to the cardinal doctrine of re-incarnation, and what it actually is in practice; and, did opportunity permit, it would not be a difficult undertaking to show the weakness, and more than weakness, of this doctrinal theory as presented from the esoteric side; for unless it can be proved by "sober scientific fact" to rest upon surer foundations than the examples given—which are fathered by the brilliant mouthpiece of the alleged Himalayan Adepts—then the cultured minds of the Occident are doing the right thing in rejecting the claims, and along with the claims the whole philosophy of the system, put forth on behalf of those hitherto unseen and unknown (except by the favoured few) custodians of occult wisdom and powers. Occult truth does not require bolstering up by questionable means; and to use unnecessary mystification, when the cultivated intellects of the age are rightly demanding the abandonment of the now obsolete methods of the past, which, instead of liberating the mass from the bondage of ignorance, have been used for the purpose of enslaving the many to the few, is to persist in a course which all lovers of liberty will reject and resist. How can they do otherwise with a system that commences on its esoteric side, theoretically, with the theft of a ready-made child-body, and finishes on its exoteric side with a transparent fraud?

It is quite open for the leaders of the Theosophical movement to challenge, and even deny, the statements I have given (which are only a small part); but such denial, to be of any practical value, must be accompanied by proof that the statements are incorrect; because this is a question—not of the superiority, or otherwise, of doctrinal teaching, but of actual fact. I have given my authority, and here I leave it to the thoughtful consideration of those whom it may concern.

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

I apologise to Dr. Wyld for having represented him as carrying about one ring, instead of a series of rings; but I cannot quite admit that his correction of me on this matter is "important." My point was simply that the particular ring, which was the subject of experiment in the case under debate, may have been examined, and so imitated. So far from denying the possibility of such examination, Dr. Wyld expressly admits it, the medium having actually been allowed to take the ring home with him. This fact was not mentioned in Dr. Wyld's first account—surely a very grave omission. As regards the markings, (1) I do not see the difficulty of imitating "1,000 minute markings, some of them as small as pin-points," for a person who has a pin and a few hours at his disposal; and (2) before admitting that imitation would have had to be carried to such a pitch of minuteness I should need to know whether Dr. Wyld actually adopted the only course which would give any relevance to his mention of these minute markings—whether he made a complete chart of the marks, before committing the ring to the medium, and assured himself that the ring on the medium's wrist was similarly marked, by comparing it in situ with his chart. To regard the identification of the ring that fell on the floor as sufficient would, of course, be to assume that that ring was the one found on the medium's wrist—as to which I shall have a word to say further on. Still it would be interesting to know whether the chart came into play even at that later stage.

Appropos of his committing the ring to the medium, as well as on the subsequent point about not getting his friends to test the condition of the medium's arm, Dr. Wyld uses language which implies that, though I may not see the wisdom of his acting as he did, better judges would. There is here a certain confusion of thought. I was criticising not his wisdom, or his knowledge of Spiritualism, but his evidence that a certain event had taken place. I should be the last to deny that unusual phenomena may demand peculiar conditions. It may quite be the case that, to obtain this particular phenomenon, certain measures were necessary, and that Dr. Wyld did well to adopt them. If the measures happen to be such as cannot but militate against obtaining conclusive evidence, it is, of course, not his fault; but neither is it mine, if I point out that they have so militated.

I do not know whether Dr. Wyld means his excuse for not having explored the medium's nude arm up to the elbow to be taken seriously. He says: "The medium wore a shirt and a coat sleeve, and to remove these while I held his left hand would have been a feat requiring the presence of the Davenport Brothers." "Removal" of these impediments to the extent which permits the passage of a hand up to the elbow is a feat which I have just performed with my own left hand on my own right arm; and which I shall be happy to repeat on either of Dr. Wyld's arms, while grasping the hand that belongs to it. Success depends on unfastening the sleeve-link of the shirt—an operation in which I should have thought that Dr. Wyld must have had nightly practice for many years.

To his next remark I take no particular exception. He is perfectly convinced, by the evidence of his own tactile and muscular sensations, that he clasped the medium's left hand throughout; and he says that I—had the experience been mine—would have had a similar conviction. I not only admit, but I expressly urge, that there is a certain quality in the evidence of one's own healthy senses which nothing can quite replace. I therefore did not complain of Dr. Wyld's personal conviction: my criticism of his account was entirely from the point of view of evidence.

And since he asks me whether I should "have been much affected," had his friends supplemented his examination of the arm, I reply that I should have regarded the evidence as very decidedly improved by their corroboration.

With respect to the dimensions of the ring and the wrist, it is probable that my mode of expression was faulty, since "C. C. M.," as well as Dr. Wyld, has misunderstood me. My meaning was not that an item of evidence, however inconclusive, could render other independent items less conclusive; but that when one finds stress laid on an inconclusive point, one's view of the witness's general competence as an investigator is thereby affected; and in that way the case, which is only known to outsiders through his investigation, is in a true sense weakened. It is, I think, beyond dispute that persons exist who can pass their hands through a band which pretty closely encircles their wrists; and the hypothesis which I threw out was not therefore—as "C. C. M." supposes—a mere vague suggestion, without relation to ascertained facts. On the contrary, the relation is a very close one; and the compressibility which I suggested is, I submit, "at least approximate" to what might antecedently be supposed possible. I am not aware, it is true, that the feat I have mentioned has ever been performed when the band was of rigid metal; but in the present case, the metal must have been very far from fitting closely round the wrist; since Dr. Wyld seems to have been able, while it was still encircling the limb, to suspend it by a string and make it ring with a blow.

On the other matter with which "C. C. M." is chiefly occupied—the hypothesis that the hand which Dr. Wyld held may have been changed—my difference from him, if it exists, is of the slightest. But, however near to certainty a single test brings us, another independent test must surely bring us a little nearer. May I not then mildly remark that "one would be glad to know," not only that Dr. Wyld clasped the hand tightly, but that he ascertained throughout that it was the left hand, by the position of the thumb?

Finally, "C. C. M." thinks that the case is of high evidential value. Had I not thought the same, I should not have considered it worth writing about. But my view is now, I admit, a little modified. It must be remembered that my former criticism went almost entirely on the assumption that the ring found on the medium's wrist was really Dr. Wyld's ring. But the opportunities for imitation which Dr. Wyld's reply has revealed make me feel that this point is somewhat more doubtful than at first appeared. "C. C. M." remarks that it is unimportant, "provided the dimensions are the same, and the rim of the ring found is ascertained to be perfectly solid." But to ascertain these facts would require a very careful examination of the ring in situ. The only evidence adduced is that Dr. Wyld and his friends could not remove it, which might very well be; and that it rang when struck. But sounds are the most uncertain things to judge of; and I certainly should hesitate to place reliance on a test of this sort, unless such a blow was struck as must certainly have seriously endangered the encircled wrist. Afterwards, we are told, as the party "all walked about in the light, the ring fell off from the medium's wrist." Now can Dr. Wyld add that he kept the medium's wrist under close observation, and saw the ring quit it? If so, the case for the identity of the rings will be considerably strengthened. At the same time, it is clear that we have now passed well within the bounds of possible sleight of hand; and "C. C. M.'s" remarks on the fallacies of visual observation, and on an expert's powers of diverting the attention, are exactly in point. Supposing the encircling ring to have been so constructed as to open and shut in some secret way, it could be no great feat for a conjurer, while "walking about in the light," to remove it, and simultaneously to drop another ring in such a way as to produce the impression that the latter had fallen from his wrist.

I am not expressing an opinion that this was what took place. But Dr. Wyld has described his experiment as a demonstration of the passage of matter through matter; and that is a word which cannot be too carefully used. I rejoice to learn that the experiment is to be repeated; and I hope that Dr. Wyld's energy and perseverance may have their fullest reward.—I am, &c.,

EDMUND GURNEY.

To students of occult phenomena the ring experiment as mentioned by Dr. Wyld is no novelty. With Mr. Husk, rings and other objects are passed on his arm at almost every séance held, either at his own residence or with private circles. I think that but for Mr. Gurney's remarks the subject would have provoked little or no controversy, as the majority of Spiritualists have witnessed the ring test to their own satisfaction; that is to say, they have found on the wrist of the medium a ring which, besides being too narrow to pass over his hand, was previously deposited on the table, examined by every one present, and found to be perfectly solid. I have, thus far, witnessed the same results over and over again, and am personally convinced that no fraud or trickery is practised. In fact, I have met with other somewhat similar tests, which appear to be far more conclusive than even Dr. Wyld's experience. However, the question as to whether the arm passes through the ring or the ring through the arm, has never been settled. And although no amount of criticism would shake the belief of some Spiritualists that the ring really passes through the flesh, no one has ever seen the operation. Yet, at the same time, the critical remarks of Mr. Gurney are received with an amount of surprise that would be only justifiable were the whole world convinced of the reality of "matter passing through matter." Mr. Gurney's opinion that "in these matters it is impossible to place implicit reliance on the report of a single sense of a single person" is, to my experience in séance-room mysteries, but too well founded; especially as far as the sense of sight is concerned. Of course I do not refer to the sight of a pitch dark room, but to the respective powers of observation of those examining the forms and objects that can be seen by means of the luminous slate.

As to the senses of hearing and of touch, every one in the habit of sitting in total darkness will be aware of the difficulty in localising sound, and in discovering the nature of the object one touches, or by which one may be touched. Dr. Wyld's case may be sufficiently clear to those who have themselves witnessed similar occurrences, though to others of no such experience, the mere suggestion of a ring (not a trick-ring) being passed through the human wrist, must sound like a joke, and naturally so, since the actual passage of matter through matter never has been witnessed, or been proven.

Were it not for a certain amount of opposition which the spiritualistic theory must unavoidably encounter, Spiritualists would but too readily assume that, with their experience of occult phenomena, they were at the same time the sole possessors of infallible knowledge respecting their cause, origin, and modus operandi. Fair, and even unfair, criticism has at least the advantage of causing us more thoroughly to consider our facts before we attempt to explain them. As far as the ring experiment goes, it seems to me that either the arm or the substance of the ring must have been temporarily disintegrated, merely because we have no other means of explaining the mystery. But what do we know of the phenomenon itself except the visible results? Nothing. No one present during such an experiment sees how the ring comes to be transferred to the wrist. Now, how can any person in his right senses expect an outsider to believe the statements of those who did not see what really took place? Nor even could those who successfully conducted the experiment reasonably claim a scientific discovery. For science does not and cannot trouble itself with the observation of mere results, obtained no one knows how. Science wants to learn the cause. It requires to know whether matter does pass through matter, and if so, how it does pass. Even were the ring test sufficiently established as a fact, we would be then only at the beginning of a scientific investigation, and on the point of entry of a fresh field of inquiry, viz., How is it done?

Unless the very process be observed there can be no other fact established than the fact of having to deal with a tremendous puzzle.

Dr. Wyld expresses his hope that Mr. Husk might by practice produce the ring experiment in a lighted room; "the hands of the operators and the rings only being in darkness." What, may I ask, would be gained by this? If Mr. Husk would sit in darkness with the hands and the rings in the light, one might entertain some hope of success. Now this can be done. "Irresistible" informs me that it is not impossible to exhibit the "passage" by the luminous slate! But, says my informant, "I cannot do so now, it depends on the conditions, but I think it can, under favourable circumstances, be accomplished."

I need not say what delight it will afford me to witness so stupendous a phenomenon, and sincerely hope both Mr. Gurney and Dr. Wyld will, on that occasion, share my experience. But to return to Dr. Wyld's remark (second portion of fourth paragraph, p. 25), as regards the ring falling to the floor when the hand was placed behind the window curtain.

Does Dr. Wyld overlook the fact that in his friend's case the ring was taken off, not put on? I must call his attention to the well-known theory that the process of fixing the ring on the wrist and the mode of taking it off are considered to be different in their operation, inasmuch as in the first case the medium's wrist is disintegrated, whilst in the second the atoms of the ring are divided. I am aware the information obtained from spirits or trance speakers anent the process of disintegration is somewhat conflicting. Still, as the ring goes on and comes off again, it is only reasonable to pay some attention to what the operators themselves have to say about it. "Irresistible" tells me that the medium, being entranced, feels no pain, and hence the iron ring can be made to go through the flesh. In the second case, the ring drops off because its atoms are divided—an operation which becomes imperative on account of the medium having returned to his normal condition. How far this information is correct no one will be able to tell until the experiment can, as promised, be conducted in the light of the luminous slate.

In conclusion, I may add that on three occasions a ring was passed on Mr. Husk's wrist whilst I held his hand from the beginning until the very end of the séance. These rings had been carefully examined by several present, having for that purpose been placed on the table before the light was extinguished. Once a lady's muff was, during the earlier part of the séance, removed from her lap, and directly afterwards she discovered that something was on her arm; a light was struck, and her arm found inside the muff.

On another occasion I requested "Irresistible" to put a chair over my arm. To make sure of the genuineness of the test, I insisted that the chair to be used should be one of the six bent-wood chairs that still remained unoccupied. I was then asked whether the one upon which I was seated would do. "Then," said "Irresistible," "stand up," and at the same moment my chair was taken away. I felt a soft hand holding my right arm, and then a chair, which came, as far as I can judge, from the medium's arm, was hanging over mine. Some considerable commotion was heard near the medium, which led me to believe that all the unoccupied chairs were being deposited on the medium's person. Legs of chairs kept coming in contact with my head, and the rattling of more chairs was heard somewhere higher up; darkness preventing me finding out exactly where. By this time the medium was bodily lifted upon the table, and immediately afterwards a light was procured, showing Mr. Husk seated on a chair turned with the back to his chest, both his arms through it, one more chair hanging over his arm—the hand of which had never for a second left my grasp.

"Money Challenges."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—There are individuals who seem to be born to find fault with every one and every thing, except with themselves and their own doings. Their criticism may well be met with a shrug of the shoulder. But when serious men like "H. E." in your last issue, protest against something which seems to shock their sense of propriety, however mistaken, an explanation is due. "H. E." finds fault with me for having accepted Mr. Labouchere's challenge. "So many heads, so many judgments," says the good old German proverb; for I have received no end of congratulatory letters, not only from English Spiritualists, but from France and Belgium, for doing that very same thing. "H. E." avers that he has twelve years' experience in Spiritualism; I have twenty, and mine has proved to me that the ultima ratio of appealing to the pocket of garrulous scoffers is the only thing that will stop their ignorant folly. Seventeen years ago I challenged the facetious Professor Tyndal; he would not pick up my gauntlet, but, like an honest man, has held his peace against Spiritualism ever since. Five years ago I did the same towards Professor Stefanoni, editor of Il Messaggero, of Rome, whose language against Spiritualism and the Spiritualists was simply unendurable; he took care, as a wise man, not to risk his 30,000 francs, preferring to hold his tongue, and moreover he has of late published tales in his journal under the title of "A True Ghost Story"! But what has been the result of accepting Mr. Labouchere's challenge? Has not "H. E." observed how Truth has at once dismissed its offensive language which for three consecutive weeks it indulged in, semper crescendo, against our much esteemed medium, Mr. W. Eglinton? * Am I to be censured by "H. E." for doing this? And do not these challenges call public attention to the subject and multiply inquiry? If gold is the only argument possessing any value in the eyes of our opponents, we must submit to the necessity of the times and proclaim Spiritualism from the house tops with every honest means in our power. This I intend always doing.—Very truly yours,

29, Colville-road, Notting Hill, W.

G. DAMIANI.

January 18th, 1885.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Convinced by the reasoning of "H. E." and others whose views I respect, I ask leave of Spiritualists to withdraw my (limited) upholding of those who are willing to accept the wager of battle; my gallant friend Damiani among them.

It was one of the pithy sayings of Daniel O'Connell, "Inconsistency! What is it? Merely saying I am wiser to-day than I was yesterday!"

Let us abjure all such unseemly methods of defending our faith. We can do so without money deposits.

But I hope that in thus ventilating the matter, we shall pave the way to a committee of inquiry—partly named by our opponent—from which will ultimately emanate a "report."—Truly yours, 17th January.

The Testimonial to Mr. J. J. Morse.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Allow me to express my hearty thanks to yourself and the editor of the Medium for the valuable assistance by advertisement and otherwise you have given to the Testimonial Fund of Mr. J. J. Morse. At the same time permit me to take this opportunity of thanking those who have so freely given their services at the concert, as well as those who attended the same on Wednesday, the 14th inst.; and last, though not least, most cordially to thank those who have subscribed to the fund.

I am sure the sympathy and kindly feeling shown in many ways on the occasion of this farewell benefit will not only help Mr. Morse, but will aid our cause, since every kind thought and deed which advances Spiritualism will meet with tenfold reward.

Allow me to trespass on your space to acknowledge the subscriptions of Mr. Donaldson, £1; Mrs. Tebb, 10s.; Mr. Haskins, 10s.; Miss Otteley, 10s.; A Friend, 10s.; E. T., 5s.; Mr. Towns, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Pole, 2s. 6d.; Mr. Thurston, 2s.; Mr. Weeks, 2s.; S. R., 1s. These sums with those acknowledged by Mr. Frank Everitt, in "LIGHT," and the Medium, and the proceeds of the concert, amounted to £47 10s. 6d. The purse was presented to Mr. Morse by Mr. Donaldson on the occasion of the concert.—I am, sir, yours truly,

REVIEWS.

EGYPT, AND THE WONDERS OF THE LAND OF THE PHARAOHS.

By William Oxley.—London: Trübner and Co.; price 7s. 6d.; or may be obtained direct from the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.

This book comes very opportunely just now, when the eyes of Europe and the civilised world are fixed upon Egypt and her affairs. Without, however, entering into a discussion of the perplexing political problems relating to this marvellous country, we may say that Mr. Oxley finds in her past history a full promise of her future destiny. This he foreshadows in glowing terms, when "Britain, having made use of her opportunity, seizes Egypt for her own good and for the good and happiness of millions of human beings who will only be too glad to welcome her presence and her power." Whether this future, which, with prophetic eye, Mr. Oxley sees before a land once rich, powerful, and great, but now, through misrule, anarchy, and despotism, one of the waste places of the earth, will be realised, who can say?

The chief interest of the book to our readers lies in the insight which Mr. Oxley brings to bear upon his subject. He claims that Egypt, her monuments, her history, and her destiny can only be rightly gauged and understood in the light of spiritual science. He strikes his own keynote in the following sentence, and we cannot better explain the motif of the book than in his own words. He says: "Without the recognition of this element (Psychology) in ancient Egyptian society, the more than half remained unknown; and my chief object in publishing this work is to attract attention to this part of the social, political, and especially religious economy of Egypt, the elements of which in past centuries have been so deeply entwined in our own history." Following out this idea, an interesting and capable book has been written, and the author is to be congratulated on the success he has achieved. The chapters on Egyptian Magic and Spiritualism are especially interesting, and although we are far from endorsing all Mr. Oxley says—especially in regard to the Osirian origin of Christianity—yet we feel we can cordially commend the work for its fair and truth-seeking spirit. We, of course, regard the book as of value from the especial standpoint of a Spiritualist, and in that respect find in it much to engage attention and engender profitable thought. Much light is thrown on the intimate connection between the occult knowledge of all ages and all peoples—parts, as it were, of one great whole. But we cannot refrain from remarking that the line of argument which, finding parallelisms and foreshadowings of Christian rite, doctrine, and belief in other faiths, jumps to the conclusion that they are only true, and Christianity is only false, is apt to lead one into difficulties. The argument may and often does prove too much. We fully recognise the value of much that Mr. Oxley has written; his facts are good; in many instances his deductions are fair and legitimate; and our points of difference, dealing as they do with matters hardly allied to the object of this journal, we are not called upon to discuss here. We wish the book a thorough success.

MONEY CHALLENGES.—Since we wrote the note which appears in the previous column, Signor Damiani has offered to prove to Mr. Labouchere that the so-called dead return by means of materialisations. No offer more unwise could, in our opinion, have been made. If a man is unprepared to investigate psychography, he is ten thousand times less ready to examine the most delicate and occult of all phases of psychical phenomena. We regret being obliged to differ, and that on all grounds, and in the most emphatic manner, from Signor Damiani; but the course suggested by him can, we believe, only lead to incalculable harm, and our duty as spiritualist journalists demands a strong protest against it. We shall return to the question next week, and, in the meantime, invite our readers to favour us with their views on the matter.

THE "CREDULOUS DOLTS" OF SPIRITUAL INVESTIGATION.

There is a belief among many persons that those individuals who have investigated and become convinced of the facts of spiritual communication are of feeble intelligence, easily deluded and imposed upon, ready to accept as facts the simplest tricks of a conjurer, and quite unfitted to judge when evidence is placed before them. Persons who have formed these conclusions are usually those who have never investigated or witnessed any spiritual phenomena. They have seen imitations of them, such, for example, as are presented at the Egyptian Hall, and called an exposé of Spiritualism; or they see a man tied with rope in the streets, and when this man frees himself they exclaim that this exposes the Davenport Brothers' tricks, and they then wonder at the folly of those who have been imposed on by mediums.

In a certain weekly paper, a writer who evidently possesses no knowledge or experience of facts, lately stated that the manner in which a "spirit-hand" was produced was as follows: "A stuffed glove was used to represent the spirit-hand. The medium sat between two inquirers, holding a hand of each; he then slipped away, and made the inquirers hold their hands, they all the time imagining they were holding the medium, and so the trick is done."

When we see statements of this kind put forward we are convinced that there are some types of mind quite incapable of investigating any problems or evidence requiring intensity of intelligence. These minds are like those of the police agent, in Edgar Poe's amusing tale, who failed to find the purloined letter; or they are like a savage, who could not distinguish between a diamond and the imitation exhibited in the Palais Royal.

The fact really is, that not one mind in fifty is capable of investigating any problem requiring great subtlety of intellect. Prejudice and pre-conceived opinions rule the average of minds, and conclusions are formed from these, instead of from the facts and evidence which can be obtained.

The history of the opposition offered to discoveries affords endless examples of this fact. When the proof or demonstration required high-class intelligence to comprehend it, this proof was usually rejected or ignored, and it was so ignored by the men who were, from their previous training supposed to be well qualified as judges.

When people read about the contemptible nonsense that was written by so-called learned men to prove that the earth could not rotate, and that those persons who believed it did rotate were either fools or impostors, they usually congratulate themselves on living in an age when common-sense and science prevail, and when such twaddle would never even appear in print. Contemptible, however, as were the arguments urged in olden times against novel truths, they were comparatively sound and logical compared to much that has been written lately in order to prove that the so-called spiritual phenomena are all the result of trickery. The way it is done is as follows: The medium slips away from between two investigators, joins these investigators' hands, they all the time believing they are holding the medium. The medium flourishes about a stuffed glove, and lo! it is a spirit-hand. Let us see now who are these imbeciles who have been thus tricked. There is Robert Houdin, the great French conjurer; Professor Jacobs, the conjurer; Samuel Bellachini, Court conjurer at Berlin; Louis Napoleon, Professor Crookes, Professor Varley, Alfred R. Wallace, Dr. Elliotson, Professor de Morgan, Dr. Gregory, Professor Zollner, the late Emperor of Russia, the Prince of Solms, President Lincoln, and thousands of other men of a similar class of mind.

These men devoted months and years to the investigations. They commenced with the usual doubts and suspicions, but after long and careful experience were obliged to admit that the facts existed, and the only theory which satisfactorily explained these facts was the spiritual theory.

But what do all these investigations matter to the man who knows everything without ever having investigated? That a steamship could not possibly cross the Atlantic was well-known to a certain (so-called) scientific man, and people who believed it could so cross were fools, in this man's opinion. He had never thoroughly examined the facts, it is true, but what did he care for that? His profound knowledge enabled him to pronounce a verdict without examining, and those people who had examined and had arrived at a different conclusion were to be sneered at.

We have similar classes of minds in the present day belonging to men who can sit in their back offices and write articles of a similar class, showing that stuffed gloves and fools, or dupes, will explain the whole affair. Now such remarks should be treasured. Facts will prevail in spite of the opposition of such arrogant ignorance, and in the future these remarks will be valuable as examples of the class of minds which influenced, to a certain extent, public opinion; and future generations will then hold up such men to the ridicule they deserve, and will speak of the dark age of 1885, when such nonsense was received as a proof of the great mental power of the writers.

MR. STANTON MOSES is anxious to gather in all books, MSS., extracts from newspapers, and the like which may have been borrowed from him by friends, and have not been yet returned. He will be much obliged by any such being returned to him at 21, Birchington-road, N.W., with the least possible delay.

MR. JOHN RUMBLE, a "South London Working Man," writes to us in grateful terms of Mr. Eglinton's kindness in giving him and a friend an opportunity of witnessing the phenomenon of psychography. They were very successful in their experiments, and Mr. Eglinton will, we are sure, be glad to know that his kindness has been thoroughly appreciated by them.

SPAIN.

The Annual General Meeting of Spiritualists at Tarassa has issued a tract for distribution, entitled Verdades (Truths). It has also established a fund in aid of old and infirm Spiritualists.

The Spiritualist circles of Marressa have collectively published a pamphlet, and distributed it freely in the district, replying in moderate language to the misrepresentations of Spiritism and Spiritualism by one of the dignitaries of the Cathedral of Marressa.

El Faro Spiritista is the title of a new publication at Barcelona. In its first number it says: "We shall be guided by ideas based upon rational Spiritism, and the morality of the Gospel. Let none expect from us exalted scientific discussion nor high literature: we are of the people and propose to write for the people." It informs its readers that El Lazo de Union is the title of a Spiritist Society now established in the Antilles, thus completing the circle of Spiritual Societies round the world.—Le Spiritisme.

THE CHROMO PLATES.—In answer to inquiries, we wish to state that we did not announce the publication of these plates for any special date in January. We simply advertised their issue during the current month. The artist has found more time requisite than he at first thought would be necessary, but we hope not to be compelled to request any extension of time. They will appear as a supplement to "LIGHT," gratis (for subscribers only), very shortly. Those friends who have their copies of "LIGHT" sent direct from this office will receive them in the usual course; but subscribers who obtain this journal through any other channel will have to apply for the plates in the terms of our previous announcement. No application will be considered after the 31st inst. After that date the pictures will only be obtainable on payment.

We understand that Mr. W. Eglinton has made arrangements to leave London about the middle of February on a short visit to a distinguished person in Vienna, from which city he will afterwards proceed to Hamburg on the invitation of a scientific committee appointed to investigate the phenomena occurring in his presence. He will also stay a few days in Paris, and will probably remain for a short period at The Hague on his return journey. Mr. Eglinton, however, has made these movements conditional upon his not being wanted in London in connection with the recent controversy, as it is his intention not to give his assailants the slightest ground for attack on the pretence that he has by his absence from London shirked any issue which may be raised. The change will give him a much-needed rest after the strain he has undergone during the past month or two.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE CORRESPONDENCE ON SPIRITUALISM.

We quote the two following letters addressed to the Pall Mall Gazette, as they form a fitting and complete answer to the vulgar communication of Professor Ray Lankester already published. Mr. Eglinton's letter was, however, most unjustly refused insertion!

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—It is difficult to believe Professor Ray Lankester so ignorant as he must be if his letter to you is honest. But he may impose, in either case, on others innocently unacquainted with the facts. He certainly is notorious for having "prosecuted" Slade; but he never "caught him in the act" of cheating. The magistrate, Flowers, said the evidence for the defence in that case was "overwhelming," but he excluded it from consideration, and based his decision, very strangely, on "inferences to be drawn from the known course of nature." Persecuted by ignorant hostility, Slade was convicted by a tribunal incapable of adapting itself to unfamiliar problems. Serious inquirers with open minds knew all the while, by scores, that the writing on Slade's slates was produced by some abnormal agency, and not by cheating on his part. When he escaped, through a legal flaw in the decision, from the penalty so shamefully awarded to him, Slade, through a friend, wrote from The Hague to Lankester, generously crediting him with good motives for what he had done, and showing no indignation, but offering to return to London, to visit the persecutor at his own house, to sit with him at his own table with his own slates, and convince him that the writing which would come upon them was not produced by trickery. Professor Lankester never answered this letter, thereby earning the deep and lasting contempt of every earnest inquirer into certain mysteries of nature of which the slate-writing under notice, trivial as its character often is, and wrong as Spiritualists may be in interpreting it, is certainly a casual manifestation. Intellectual ruffians who persecute spiritual mediums from bigoted hatred of the inquiries in which these persons are instrumental do mischief in two ways. With the help of clumsy laws, ill qualified to cope with questions concerning mediumship, they first of all bring about much horrible injustice. Secondly, they impede the growth of knowledge; for, though the more emotional Spiritualists cling to their persecuted faith more tenaciously than ever, the world at large is misled into supposing the bullies of Materialism to have proved (when they have merely won) their cases. I have used strong language in this letter, not because I like to do so as a rule, but because Professor Lankester's conduct in this matter has always seemed to me peculiarly despicable. In pluming himself upon it now, after he ought to have grown ashamed of it, by the light of later experience gathered by wiser men, his audacity claims a straightforward reply.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. P. SINNETT.

Ladbroke-gardens, Kensington Park, W.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—As there seems to be no prospect of Signor Damiani and Mr. Labouchere coming to terms, I trust you will do me the justice of allowing me to remind your readers that I have not shrunk in any way from a fair investigation of the abnormal phenomena which occur in my presence. Since you did me the honour of inserting my letter in reply to Mr. Cumberland, the discussion of the question has entered upon another phase, and there is some danger of the fact being overlooked that I accepted Mr. Cumberland's challenge, stipulating only that the money element should be eliminated, and proposing that a committee of six gentlemen should be chosen, three by myself and three by the other side; that the committee should have six meetings for experiment; and that if their experiments were successful they should report the fact to Mr. Cumberland, should call upon him, in accordance with his promise, to "explain away such demonstrations by natural means," and should require him to reproduce the same phenomena under the same conditions. To this offer on my part Mr. Cumberland has never replied.

And yet it has been coolly assumed by some of your correspondents that I am simply an impostor; that the phenomena are jugglers' tricks; and that I am afraid to allow them to be put to the test by competent observers. Mr. Ray Lankester, indeed, goes so far as to indulge in such epithets as "Sludge," "pickpocket," "unsavoury specimen of natural history,"

"vermin," "skunk," &c. I am not going to imitate Mr. Ray Lankester. I refer to his language only to point out that this is the sort of gentleman that I am taunted with being unwilling to meet; and of whom I am asked to believe that he would enter upon an inquiry with perfectly unbiassed minds and quite open to conviction! I have no intention, sir, to waste my time with such men, or indeed with any who have publicly committed themselves to a hostile attitude without having ever attempted an honest and patient investigation of the phenomena and of the conditions under which they are produced. And I have no occasion for doing so, because my perfect rectitude in the matter, and my absolute freedom from any active part in the production of the slate-writing manifestations, have been abundantly testified by men the eminence of whose position in the scientific world even Mr. Ray Lankester himself would not venture to question for a single moment.

If it be urged that professional conjurers would be better observers than even men of science, then I reply that some of the most accomplished conjurers of the age have assured themselves of the genuineness of the phenomena.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said, "As a prestidigitateur of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers, were absolutely true and belonged to the spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena."

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made a sworn declaration on the 6th December, 1877, in which he said, after describing his investigations with Dr. Slade, "I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus, and any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible."

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, happened to be giving his entertainments in Calcutta while I was there in the early part of 1882, and he addressed a letter to the Indian Daily News, in which he said that he should like to investigate the slate-writing phenomena in my presence. As I was assured that he was in every respect a gentleman, and would bring an honest and impartial mind to the inquiry, I consented to meet him. On the 25th January he wrote to the Indian Daily News as follows: "In your issue of the 13th January, I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitateur, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid. I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved. It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed. . . . I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed any one who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. . . . I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

Now that you have kindly allowed me to place these facts before your readers, they will readily understand how it is that I am not greatly moved either by the violent language of Mr. Ray Lankester, or by the absurdly grotesque revelations of Truth as to "How it is done!" I can bide my time. The facts will be acknowledged some day, when prejudice has grown tired of its vain attempts to strangle them.

Yours respectfully,

11, Langham-street, W. W. EGLINTON.
January 20th, 1885.

"M. A. (Oxon)."—We learn that "M. A. (Oxon)" is still confined to his bed, and in great pain. He is quite unable to reply to letters or attend to business of any kind. The virulence of the disease seems, however, to be abating, and the paroxysms, though not less frequent, are less violent. The course pursued by the disease is quite free from complication. The patient is very weak and much pulled down.

THE PUBLIC DISCUSSION OF SPIRITUALISM.

By FRANK PODMORE, M.A.

As Mr. Theobald has, in the last number of "LIGHT," referred, in somewhat misleading terms, to recent remarks of mine, I will ask you to insert the correction which he has challenged. Mr. Theobald represents me as having said that "the ghosts are subjective, and not objective." In the speech to which he refers, I expressly refrained from making use of the words "subjective" and "objective," because I think that, used in this connection, they only serve to darken counsel. Nor did I venture—as Mr. Theobald implies—to affirm anything categorically on the matter. I merely put forward a tentative explanation—and I was at some pains to make it clear that the explanation was merely a tentative and provisional one—of certain apparitions, the occurrence of which I regard as fully proved, viz., apparitions seen coincidently with exceptional crises in the life of the person whom they resemble. That explanation is, that the mental disturbance accompanying (e.g.) the approach of death may be communicated to the mind of some friend, and—in accordance with the experimental analogy of thought-transference—may give rise to a thought of the dying person; and that this thought, abnormal in its origin, may also be abnormal in its manifestation, and may appear for a moment to be part of the external world—in short, an "apparition;" but while the cause of the "apparition" is external, the precise form which it assumes is determined by the mind of the percipient, being, in fact, nothing more than an abnormal intensification of the mental imagery which, in ordinary minds, accompanies the thought of any concrete object. But not only did I disclaim any belief on my own part in this hypothesis as a final and sufficient explanation of the facts, but I even stated that it was inadequate to explain many facts within my own knowledge. For a full explanation of these further facts I added that I was content to wait.

As regards the phenomena of Spiritualism, I said that I could not at present regard most of the alleged facts, as sufficiently proved; and it was this remark of mine which has, apparently, furnished Mr. Theobald with a text for his homily. But, in saying this, I was not ignorant of the surprising occurrences which Mr. Theobald has so often and so circumstantially described in these columns. Indeed, I may claim that in some respects my knowledge in this matter is greater than that of most readers of "LIGHT," and is equalled only by Mr. Theobald's own: for I am in possession of certain facts—not hitherto published, though known, as I understand, to Mr. Theobald—which appear to me to throw some light on the genesis of these marvellous phenomena. This is not the time for detailing these additional facts at length; but perhaps I may be permitted to make a few comments on the Greek quotation which Mr. Theobald has given in "LIGHT" of the 17th inst. Mr. Theobald sent me the original spirit-writing a few weeks ago, and I thought it so interesting that I made a copy of that part of it which contained the Greek quotation. I have that copy before me now, and I should like to make a few remarks on it supplementary to Mr. Theobald's account of the matter.

I. In the first place, Mr. Theobald has omitted to mention that the spirit ascribed the quotation—which is prose, and could not be mistaken by the veriest tyro in Greek for anything else—to the first book of the Odyssey. Now the Odyssey is a poem; and the first book of the Odyssey contains no allusion to Ulysses' encounter with the Cyclops. That fact appears to me to possess some interest, and should, I think, have been stated.

II. In the second place, the word μεν (men), as I wrote to Mr. Theobald at the time, is in an impossible position; it is a word that cannot stand first in a sentence. Mr. Theobald, upon this, observes: "I apprehend the spirit can put it where it likes." Well, I guess it can. We may, no doubt, concede to a spirit a similar license to that which the "Duchess" claims for herself in "Through the Looking-Glass," when she expresses her determination to make words mean what she pleases. A spirit sees "with larger, other eyes than ours," and can perhaps look down upon the rules of grammar as "merely conventional signs."

III. In the third place, I observe that the Greek quotation is written very clearly, each letter having evidently been formed slowly and with considerable care. The writing is, moreover, fairly correct. It is, indeed, marvellously correct in view of the unquestionable fact that it is the production of a person who was entirely ignorant of Greek. My reasons for forming this conclusion are numerous. I have mentioned two of them; I will briefly indicate others.

IV. The word which stands second in the sentence, πρωτον (prōton), is correctly printed in "LIGHT" (apparently from the transcript of the writing which I made for Mr. Theobald); but, as I wrote to Mr. Theobald, it is mis-spelt in the original. "Mis-spelt" is hardly the correct term, for the first two letters of the word are not Greek at all, and do not form part of the alphabet of any language with which I am acquainted. Perhaps they are Persian.

V. The third word, οὐτω (Outo), is also mis-spelt. It should be οὕτω (Outin). The mistake is a natural one for an ignorant copyist, but an impossible one for a Greek scholar.

VI. The word ὁδυσσευ (Odussue) is wrongly spelt. The correct form is Ὀδυσσεα (Odussae); but I entirely dissent from Mr. Theobald's statement that the word, as written by the spirit, "may end ea (ea). The word is not quite clearly written: the final letter may be intended for either υ (u) or ν (n), but it cannot conceivably be intended for a: and the last letter but one is indubitably υ (u).

VII. The extreme care with which the letters have been formed enables one to distinguish certain characteristics in their shape which are foreign to Greek writing.

(a) The alpha is written like an English script, α. There is a peculiarity in the formation of the Greek α which is not always obvious in the printed type, but which is quite apparent in correct Greek writing, and which is wanting in this writing. This point, however, is not conclusive, as a careless or ill-taught Greek scholar will frequently form his alphas incorrectly.

(b) The theta is found, not as in ordinary Greek writing, θ, but like a slovenly 8.

(c) The deltas are formed in much the same way as the theta, except that the upper circle is left incomplete; but this opening in the upper curved line occurs on the left side, whereas in correct Greek writing it occurs on the right, thus, δ. In one instance—the δ in the word Ὀδυσσευ—the union of the upper circle is complete, and the letter is a counterpart of the theta.

(d) Throughout the sentence (with one or two exceptions) the letters υ (u) and ν (n) are written precisely alike, in a neutral form, which might stand for either letter, but is on the whole more like υ (u). In one case this symbol takes the place of an iota, ι (i).

(e) The beta is formed, like an English B, by two separate strokes of the pen. In the Greek β, on the other hand, the straight side passes gradually into the curved lines which form the back of the letter, and the whole letter is formed by one stroke.

VIII. Lastly, the accents and the "breathings," or marks of aspiration, are, with one exception, omitted. In that one exception the mark is correctly inserted. I regret that I am unable to indicate the source from which the Greek quotation is derived; possibly from some old commentary on the Odyssey. But, on the whole, I venture to think that this spirit did not know Greek.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XIII.

THE weekly paper called Society, in giving an uncommonly fair description of the slate-writing séances with Mr. Eglinton, mentions the fact that visitors, entire strangers to the medium, get communications in the handwriting of friends, under circumstances which utterly exclude the theory of fraud. As the materialised spirits of persons whom the medium never saw appear to their friends as natural as life, so as to be instantly and perfectly recognised, so the handwriting of spirits, compared with manuscripts written during life, would be identified by any judge of handwriting.

Science—a magazine published in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and apparently written by undergraduates of its University, advocates Psychical Research in America as an antidote to Spiritualism. It says:—

"Spiritualism is an evil in the world,—in America it is a subtle and stupendous evil; a secret and unacknowledged poison in many minds, a confessed disease in others,—a disease which is sometimes more repulsive to the untainted than leprosy. Spiritualism has two supports,—the first, trickery and deceit; the second, the obscurity and inexplicableness of certain psychological processes and states."

If ever a sillier paragraph was printed in a profoundly scientific paper than the above, I should like to see it. What has science to do with the possible evils or dangers connected with any fact? It might as well denounce gravitation because a badly built house may tumble down, or a tipsy man tumble into a gutter. It might as well find moral evil in some fact in chemistry or geology. There are bad men and women, and if they continue to exist after the change we call death, they may not suddenly change their qualities. Spiritualism simply proves their existence and power to produce sensible manifestations. Science registers facts and does not denounce them.

THE American Society for Psychical Research, Science informs us: "Will try to steer safely between the Scylla of scoffing and the Charybdis of charlatan Spiritualism." But why meddle with "charlatan Spiritualism" at all? What can a Society for Research have to do with charlatanism, except to expose it, and whoever can find any "charlatan Spiritualism" and expose it will surely merit the thanks of all Spiritualists. The efforts of scientific men to examine Spiritualism in order to expose it have had, according to the late Mr. Varley, the uniform result of convincing them of its reality, so that there does not now exist one truly scientific man in the world who has seriously examined Spiritualism who is not a Spiritualist. If there be such a man, produce him. The scientific men who denounce Spiritualism as a falsehood, a delusion, or an imposture, do so upon a priori ground, and have never given the matter a scientific examination.

ANTI-SPIRITUALISTS, here and there, display a detestable temper. Professor Ray Lankester, for example, in his recent letter has given utterance to one of the most unscientific outbursts of vulgar abuse I have seen since the poem of Browning in which he pilloried himself, while venting his jealous spite on "Sludge the mejum," and shamefully outraging a most lovely woman, held in many hearts as a greater as well as a better poet than himself—who was also a Spiritualist and a friend of D. D. Home.

THE torrent of abuse from Professor Lankester, so happily answered and rebuked by Mr. Sinnett, has, however, brought back to public memory one conclusive fact—the offer of Slade to return from Holland to England, and sit with Professor Lankester, in his own house with his own friends, and satisfy him of the reality of the manifestations. A man refusing such an offer puts himself out of court. He declares a fact impossible, and shuts his eyes when invited to look at it—which is the most absurd attitude of every anti-Spiritualist.

PERHAPS Mr. Labouchere, for one who makes no pretence to science, is a better example of the merely ignorant and prejudiced opponent of Spiritualism. He denounces every fact outside his own experience as imposture—even thought-reading and the commonest facts of mesmerism, because he considers them miraculous, and he holds with an undying faith to the creed of Mr. Matthew Arnold that "miracles don't happen."

"SECULARISM," as held by its more prominent leaders, plants itself on this faith in "the laws of nature," in accordance with which the good Mr. Flowers sentenced Slade to be imprisoned three months as "a rogue and vagabond," when, as he admitted, the testimony in his favour was overwhelming. Sir Henry Hawkins did the same in a higher court, declaring that the testimony of a thousand Spiritualists, however respectable, would have no weight with him.

WHAT is to be done with men whose fanaticism of unbelief makes them refuse testimony, and who have no trust in their own powers of observation?—the men who resolutely shut their eyes and reject all testimony which is in conflict with preconceived opinions or vulgar prejudices?

OF course there is only one thing to do. It is to bring the facts to the knowledge of men of open minds, who have retained some faith in their own powers of observation. Spiritualism as a faith has pervaded the world from the remotest ages—how far the belief may have been based on observation we cannot tell. Spiritualism as a science based on carefully observed and recorded facts, is of our own time—a new element in human progress.

Now and then the expositors get exposed. They even expose each other. Irving Bishop denounces Stuart Cumberland, and Maskelyne has got a verdict of £10,000 damages against Irving Bishop for libelling him—as much as an actress gets for being robbed of an earl. If they vilify mediums they have the fairness to libel each other.

THE Literary World, noticing an article in the British Quarterly by Miss Gordon Cumming on the Chinese "Offerings of the Dead," gives the interesting fact that the universal belief in Spiritualism in China has an important influence in the administration of justice. Before sentencing a criminal the judge makes careful inquiry as to the relations and friends he may have in the spirit-world, who may wish to avenge any injustice done him, and governs himself accordingly—a man having influential friends in the spirit-world having similar advantages in China to those enjoyed in England, by one whose friends are still on this side of the veil that grows thinner and more transparent day by day.

"Our other griefs and miseries over the loss of our loved ones who go away from us through the sad portal of death, keen as they may be, are in time solaced by a wistful hope of reunion. What is that but a temporary separation, if they are awaiting us yonder with light on their faces?"—Shandon Bells.

This is a little bit of Spiritualism from a fashionable novel. Mr. Black may not have seen as much as the author of "Rienzi" did—but poets and romancers are not much if they are without this element, and the more they know the more effectively they can use the power of the invisible world to influence and mould the visible.

DR. NICHOLS, announced to give two discourses in Liverpool on Sunday, January 25th, has taken for his subjects—"Spiritualism: What it is," and "Spiritualism: What it does." One will be devoted to the facts and evidences; the other to its objects and uses. The intention is, of course, to cover, as well as can be done in two discourses, the whole ground of controversy, to meet those who say Spiritualism is not true, and if it were true what is the good of it?

So far as science is concerned, it is enough to demonstrate the reality of any fact. The usefulness of every truth may be accepted as a principle. But settling the great fact of immortality has a very wide range of uses. To know as a demonstrated fact that our conscious life will extend beyond the death of the body cannot fail to affect human character in proportion to the value we put on life. When one knows that he will live on and on, for ever and for ever, he is under intellectual compulsion to make his calculations accordingly.

WHAT the social influence of Spiritualism may be we have not yet had time to see. People cannot all at once get out of the ruts of custom and habit. The commonplaces of language will long fetter us. Our ghastly funerals and mourning for the happy "dead" will continue as a fashion long after the great majority of the people have lost all dread of death, and all unpleasant feelings in regard to it.

THE natural, spontaneous customs of Scotland, which may have had something to do with second-sight phenomena, were sensible enough—except some possible excess in the drinking habits. A funeral feast of Spiritualists with music, flowers, and congratulations to the spirit of the departed, closing with the cremation of the useless casket of the free and happy spirit, would be infinitely more satisfactory than our black pageantries of woe.

SPIRITUALISM, to all who accept it, changes sorrow to joy. The house of mourning does not exist. Our friends come to us whenever they have the needed conditions, and assure us of their life, and love, and happiness. They adjure us not to mourn for them because there is no real separation—because we are so soon to join them. This one fact changes the whole aspect of human life. Death has no sting, the grave no victory. We know that our dead friends are not only alive, more than ever alive, but that they are within speaking distance.

"Take a million of people who are in the habit of dreaming, say once a week. Some are sure to dream about their relations, and some of their relations will die about the same time. Of course, there will happen coincidences—and these are the facts gathered by societies for Psychical Research." This is the way Science accounts for one class of facts: Why not apply the same rule to all others? History is full of errors; chemists make mistakes; astronomy has varying observations; geologists are at loggerheads; there are coincidences in natural history; but with so many observers they are easily accounted for. The senses are deceptive. Yes; but how does this argument apply to classes of facts observed and recorded for twenty or thirty years by thousands of observers—the facts of psychography, for example, where the written words remain for examination, giving documentary evidence of facts which admit of only one explanation? Science that ignores, or tries to explain away any fact, makes itself ridiculous.

TESTIMONY OF THE CELEBRATED ILLUSIONIST, ROBERT HOUDIN,

To the Fact of Somnambule Lucidity (Clairvoyance).

The following is a translation of two letters addressed by Robert Houdin, after thorough investigation with the somnambulist Alexis, to the Marquis Endes de Mirville, published by the latter, during the lifetime of Houdin, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde." Paris, Vrayet de Surey, 1853. (Des esprits et de leurs manifestations fluidiques, the 1st Vol. of the author's "Pneumatologie.")

It should be premised that Robert Houdin had made the simulation of "second sight" a specialité, in addition to his acknowledged pre-eminence in other species of illusion, and his exhaustive knowledge of all the resources of his fraternity.

M. de Mirville prefaces his statement as follows:—

"You all know Robert Houdin, and will concede to that king of prestidigitators as well the sceptre of skill, as consequently the most absolute competence to detect it in others."

"One day, then, this competence occurred to us à propos of the question in hand. Long perfectly convinced by our own experiences, we were weary of hearing our esprits forts of the drawing-room, and our esprits faibles of the Institute, rejecting evidence and cutting short all our assertions by these apparently specious words:—

"Robert Houdin does as much; he plays the same games of écarté; he divines what you have in your pocket; he does

"Robert Houdin is not, it is true, a member of the Institute, but he is well-known and respected there, and has friends in it; and in the section of mechanics it is always regretted that he did not follow up that first vocation to which he owed so many ingenious inventions. As to the personality and character of this true artist, we may remember the homage which, in a recent judicial case, an eminent magistrate, himself a member of the Academy of Sciences, was pleased publicly to render him.

more. Twenty times in an entertainment, or a hundred times if it is wished, you shall hand him so many visiting cards, and immediately, with the rapidity of lightning, without any hesitation (which is not the case with your somnambulists), his son, at the other end of the stage, will repeat your name, however queer it may be; your address, however distant it may be. He has even surpassed all that; for more than once he has been seen to read a name under a thick and concealed envelope; to penetrate by a glance to the bottom of a well-closed box; to designate a distant person by a lock of hair, &c., &c. What more do you want, and are you going to show us?

"How reply to such arguments, the weakness of which one feels sooner than one can demonstrate it? Nothing is more true; Robert Houdin does all that, and does it, certainly, with a dexterity, an habitual skill which leaves far behind him the most lucid of our somnambulists. And though it is true that this constancy of success on the one side, and this uncertainty on the other, ought alone to suggest the different character of the phenomena, in Paris people jump to a conclusion (on veut aller plus vite) and ask: Why two causes, when one is enough?

"It appeared that to make an end of this eternal and vicious argument, there was nothing for it but to go and find Houdin himself.

"No sooner thought than done, and here we are in his room, face to face with him."

Then follows a circumstantial account of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received the following letter:—

"Monsieur,—As I had the honour to tell you, I wished for a second séance, and that at which I was present yesterday at Marciillet's* has been still more wonderful than the first, and leaves me no more in any doubt about the lucidity of Alexis. I went to this séance with the intention of watching well the game of écarté, which had so astonished me. I took much greater precautions this time than even on the first occasion; for, distrusting myself, I got one of my friends, qualified to assist my judgment, to accompany me.

"Here is what happened, and it will be seen that no subtleties were ever able to produce effects like that I am about to cite. I uncover a pack I had brought with me, and the cover of which I had marked, that it might not be changed. I shuffle; it is my deal. I deal with all the precautions of a man practised in the finesse of his art. Useless precautions! Alexis stops me, and indicating one of the cards which I had just placed before him on the table, 'I have the king,' he said.

"But you can know nothing yet since the turn-up card has not come out."

"You will see," he replied, 'Go on.'

"And in fact I turned up the eight of diamonds, and his own was the king of diamonds. The game continued in a manner sufficiently strange (bizarre), for he told me the cards I ought to play, although my cards were hidden under the table and clasped in my hands. To each of these cards played, he pushed one of his own without turning it up, and it was always found to be quite the right one for that which I had myself played.

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

COMPLIMENTARY CONCERT TO MR. J. J. MORSE.—A complimentary concert to Mr. J. J. Morse was held at the Cavendish Rooms, Mortimer-street, on Wednesday evening, the 14th inst., under the conductorship of Dr. J. W. Bernhard. The rooms were quite filled. As an expression of respect, and sympathy with Mr. Morse, the meeting was a success, and the utmost credit is due to Mrs. Maltby, the originator of the event. In the course of the evening Mr. R. Donaldson, on behalf of the late congregation of the Cavendish Rooms, and other friends, made a presentation of a purse of money (£27), and expressed the feelings of the meeting for Mr. Morse, his remarks being greeted with much emphasis by the audience. Mr. Morse made a feeling and earnest response, in effect acknowledging his indebtedness to all who had contributed to the gratifying success of the evening, and especially thanking Mrs. Maltby for her devoted and disinterested labours. Referring to his recent severe illness, he paid a manly tribute to the faithful devotion of his wife, to whose inspirations he was, in many ways, indebted for strength and help. He was more than satisfied with the support given to his late work, and was as delighted as he was astonished to find it had raised him such a troop of sympathetic and appreciative friends. But for that he thanked the spirits, whose servant he was. He also made special reference to the great and unvarying kindness he had received from the Spiritual Press, alike over the public work he was engaged in, and especially over the meeting then assembled. He trusted that, though he would soon be absent from them for some years, as, with his family, he intended visiting America, Australia, New Zealand, and the Cape, they would be as glad to see him on his return as they were sorry to part with him now, and with an earnest expression of the hope that not only as a medium, but as a man, he might ever hold a place in their esteem and a part in the great cause to which he had been for sixteen years devoted, Mr. Morse resumed his seat amidst sustained applause.

GLASGOW.—The Spiritualists of Glasgow have won martyrdom at an astonishingly cheap cost. Their increasing energy and liveliness have apparently become a cause for some concern to those mutual friends, Mrs. Grundy and the Rev. Dr. "Uncle" Guid, who must have made up their minds to do something "to put a stop to this sort of thing." And they have been calling upon the editor or manager of the Glasgow Herald, an organ which is ever heedful of the monitions of respectability in the shape and character of the two personages referred to, with the result that the weekly advertisement which notified Spiritualists and inquirers of the speaker at the Spiritualists' Hall and subject each Sunday evening, is henceforward debarred from taking its place amongst the usual "religious announcements." Of course the advertisement may be inserted under the heading of "Public Notices," but in that case the charge is nearly double; for the Herald is desirous of assisting Sunday piety by arranging to give publicity to "Church Notices" in the Saturday issue at a cheap rate. Laxity, however, has characterised the management of this column hitherto; for all sorts and conditions of sects, not even excepting Mormons and Secularists, have been permitted a place therein. But now the line must needs be drawn somewhere, and it is drawn at—Spiritualism! At the forenoon meeting last Sunday, —a conversational meeting—part was taken therein by the guides of Mr. E. W. Wallis and of Mr. D. Anderson, a local medium of some promise; also by several members of the Society then present. The subject was "Truth v. Expediency." In the evening the platform was taken by Mr. Wallis, whose guides spoke on the question of "How are the dead raised up?" The hall was overcrowded. The address was admirably delivered. All that the Spiritual philosophy teaches, all that the quickened eye of clairvoyance has discerned, in regard to this deeply interesting question—the gist thereof—was disclosed by the guides on this occasion. Strangers must have been astonished at the doctrine—edified, too, let us hope.—ST. MUXGO.

PLYMOUTH.—On Sunday, January 4th, a special meeting of members was held at the hall, after the usual service, to elect officers for the ensuing year. The following were unanimously elected: President, Mr. J. B. Sloman; Vice-Presidents, Messrs. O. Stentford and H. Pearce; Treasurer, Mr. Jutson; Librarian, Mr. Larcombe; Harmoniumist, Mr. Frank; Secretary, Mr. J. Paynter. Committee: Messrs. Thomas, Chapman, Jess, Best, Husson, Dellow, Frank, Williams, and Clarke. Six new members were added to the Society. On Sunday the usual circle was held in the afternoon with good results. In the evening there was a large attendance, when the guides of Mr. Carswell gave an excellent address on "Religions." Mrs. Trueman gave clairvoyant descriptions at the close. Mrs. Chapman was also controlled to speak. On Sunday next Mr. Morse will lecture for the Society at 3 p.m. and 6.30 p.m.—J. L. B. PAYNTER, Hon. Sec., 7 Buckland-street, Plymouth.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Barton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epe Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBI, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

"KNOWLEDGE," "TRUTH," AND THE PHENOMENA OF SLATE-WRITING.

BY HON. RODEN NOEL.

Mr. Procter has long been known and honoured among us as a very successful populariser of modern scientific results. But he would appear lately to have added a new laurel to his wreath, one still more distinguished: so, at least, I conclude from the recent paragraph in Knowledge anent the little book edited by Mr. Cholmondeley Pennell, in which some of us added our testimony to that of other innumerable witnesses concerning the slate-writing, which occurs in the presence of Mr. Eglinton. From this paragraph I gather that Mr. Procter must henceforth be regarded not merely with the respect due to a successful populariser and lecturer, but also with the reverence due to the discoverer of a new method in philosophy. He would appear to have become dissatisfied with that common-sense Baconian method usually termed inductive (the method now for some years affected by scientific investigators), and to be ambitious of introducing, or restoring, that a priori method, which since Bacon has fallen into much disfavour. I am constrained to draw this inference because he sets aside the published testimony of recent witnesses to certain phenomena with the remark that it is beneath his notice, and that the book is only an advertisement of Mr. Eglinton, the medium. I am not sure if I understand the latter observation. Does he mean that Mr. Eglinton bribed us? That would seem to be his meaning, unless the words are mere nonsense. If so, I can only assure him he is mistaken. But it is very indifferent to us whether he believes us or not. Now if the witnesses are known by Mr. Procter to be incapable—habitual drunkards, idiots, or persons without the normal furniture of senses—or if the conditions under which their observations were made were evidently insufficient and irrelevant for the purpose of establishing the genuine, or fraudulent, character of the phenomena in question,—then I can quite understand the attitude of Mr. Procter as a scientific man. But he does not urge these objections, and I think that any impartial reader of the book will probably decide that they do not apply to the evidence offered in it. Such is the nature of the phenomena attested that a very subtle and trained scientific investigator is not required here; though, of course, for certain other kinds of phenomena specialists might be needed, and the mere testimony of witnesses not proved to be abnormally stupid, credulous, or dishonest would count for little. But under the various and varied conditions of our respective observations, as detailed in the book, the simple question whether a slate was written on by Mr. Eglinton in broad daylight or not (written on, that is, in any way at present known to science, and fraudulently), or whether it was written on previously in a normal way, is one quite capable of being decided by men without any special scientific training. Yet, in fact, the testimony of other scientific men, almost as eminent even as Mr. Procter (together with that of the most celebrated professional conjurers), is passed over in contemptuous silence, or derided with insolent contempt, by members of the so-called scientific confraternity, who have not happened to observe the same things, or have even refused to observe them when they had the opportunity of doing so. Our testimony is but a link in a long chain, and has value as an element in a cumulative argument. While the names of Wallace, Crookes, Zöllner, Fechner, Butleroff, Wagner, Barrett, Varley, Dale Owen, Edmunds, De Morgan weigh probably (to say the least of it) as much in the scales of evidence as those of Ray Lankester and Procter, however illustrious these may be; though possibly if the former luminaries of the scientific and judicial world had but be thought them of calling at the editorial sancta of these oracles, before they so rashly published their testimony, they might have been put up to a trick or two, and prevented (poor "credulous dolts" that they are!) from making so lamentable an exhibition of their credulity! They would have learned in a couple of minutes "how the thing is done," for is not my old friend, the editor of Truth, good enough in a recent number of his paper, to give us the whole mystery of Spiritism in a nutshell?

Testimony, therefore, evidently counts for nothing with Mr. Procter. Accordingly, one has to credit him with the discovery, or rediscovery, of a scientific method. Yet, since the a priori method, as it has been heretofore known, became generally discredited after age-long trial because of the utter unprofitableness of its practical result, one must suppose that the learned editor has hit upon some new application of it all his own; and if so, one awaits his disclosure of the same with keen interest, seeing how much long and arduous labour will be saved by a formula, or process, that dispenses entirely with the necessity for patient observation, and cautious inference from experience. For certainly if the homely significance of facts is not to be scouted as altogether beneath the regard of a philosopher, it can scarcely be pretended that he may exercise the privilege (hitherto reserved even by strict Calvinists for Deity), of arbitrary election or reprobation amongst them. If a certain experience does not happen to suit the Materialism or Agnosticism of any Mr. John P. Robinson, why tant pis pour les faits! This really would appear to be the extraordinary, and scarcely conceivable, posture of mind which some of our popular scientists think it neither unbecoming, nor indecent to adopt. This would indeed appear to be their crude and barbarous notion of the scientific spirit! For in these days of immeasurable detail, and enforced division of labour, even the originality of a Procter can scarcely be found equal to original research in every department; hence it would seem likely that even he must accept some portion of his scientific creed at second hand; in other words, on testimony. Or does he know these articles of it à priori, by intuition, while other men of science have to spend years of toil in arriving at the same conclusions? Else why does he accept testimony, say, concerning the recent researches of M. Pasteur, and refuse it concerning the alleged phenomena of Spiritism, as attested, say, by Wallace, Crookes, and Zollner? For to criticise testimony is one thing, and to refuse to pay any attention to it is another. On what plea does he justify his arbitrary excommunication of so considerable an assemblage of phenomena? They want to speak to him, but he will have nothing to say to them, and puts them into a corner as if they were in disgrace. What à priori canon in his mind, and that of Mr. Lankester, induces these gentlemen to treat so considerable an array of human experience in so very cavalier a fashion? Are there aristocratic phenomena the scientist may nod to, and plebeian facts he may hold himself free to cut?

But are these alleged occurrences "miraculous"? The only relevant question is: Do they occur? If they do, then their explanation is yet to seek. But "facts are stubborn things." The truth is, these good people have made up their minds, and don't want the trouble of unmaking them; don't care to eat their own words and confess that they have been a little rash and over hasty in framing their compact little systems of materialistic dogma. But with all their assumption of superior knowledge, this new hierarchy is fully as bigoted, insincere, and arrogant as the old, steeped in prejudice, impervious to unpalatable new truth as the crassest, least cultivated boor, the most superstition-ridden inquisitor, the most arrogant ecclesiastic. But alas! it is no novel experience. The State-paid astronomer refusing to look through the telescope of Galileo lest his own theories should suffer disturbance, the Church flinging the same Galileo into prison for maintaining the correct theory of planetary motion; all that is an old story. Only when we men-monkeys play these pranks, while styling ourselves apostles of "freethought," the sorry spectacle becomes, if possible, still more lamentably ridiculous. Whenever men win the highest places as accepted leaders or teachers, they invariably assume those very proud looks, and airs of infallibility, which they had indignantly reprobated in their predecessors, till the great advancing tide sweeps them too and their fine theories away. Truth will not be stereotyped. So long as she lives, she grows. When a system refuses to do that, it means death. Consider well the position these individuals assume. Virtually it is that they themselves, having by exhaustive survey completed their little official ordnance-map of this infinite universe in which we live, any alleged feature of the country not to be found noted there can only be regarded as a palpable fraud, to be clamoured down by cat-calls, while the reporters of it are provided with jeers, imprisonment, or a horse-whip. There may be more things in Heaven and earth than were dreamed of in the philosophy of Horatio, but assuredly not more than are set down with the imprimatur of authority in the text books, or popular lectures of some new Thomas Aquinas, who, in the character of his own Pope, furnishes also his own credentials. "I am Sir Oracle, and when I speak let no dog bark." And yet the revelation of science is itself constantly shifting and changing its message!

Alas! shall Truth indeed perish with the editor of it? As for Knowledge, we know that "it shall vanish away."

There is, however, some justifiable presumption (as well as no little unjustifiable presumption) in the minds of certain scientists against the class of events in question, because these may appear to them miraculous, and the orthodox definition of a miracle is rightly held to be discredited by the course of scientific discovery. We can no longer believe in a "violation of natural law." But no believer in the genuineness of such occurrences—unless he be a very foolish person—holds them to be "miraculous" in this sense, or thinks of them as violating law. Yet every new discovery in science, until it has been classified, and reduced to law, appears to violate known law. Careful investigation proves that it is only another instance of law—of law crossing and modifying law. Much indeed must be within the compass of such mighty minds as those of Ray Lankester and Procter; dumb awe is doubtless the attitude most befitting us of the laity in contemplating them; yet can they really compass the knowledge of all laws? That is a large order! Are they then Himalayan Mahatmas? If the truth of the matter herein ought to be decided, however, as these gentlemen seem to opine, by Billingsgate, it cannot be difficult for us to find verbal missiles as good as "vermin," "skunk," or "credulous dolt," though this may be a "very pretty derangement of epithets." Wiseacre-numskull is one I pick up at a venture, and shy back "in the direction of" such pseudo-scientific roughs. We will find more if they want them. Donnybrook Fair may not prove much, but it isn't bad fun. It seems a pity, however, that Mr. Ray Lankester prints glaring misstatements about the Slade case, and, convicted of error, refuses to own himself in the wrong. That is worse than flinging dirt about. Such—and the torture of dumb animals—are some choice fruits of the vaunted scientific spirit!

But if what these gentlemen are really afraid of is that, our facts once admitted, the probability of a life after death (because the possibility of intelligence without brain) might become too palpable, one must admit that it is rather hard on them, when they had made up their minds to lie comfortably "in cold obstruction, and to rot," to have to face the old question once again, which they had supposed dead and buried long since, whether after all they may not find themselves alive yonder, "brought to book" for their behaviour here, and expected, moreover, to do some really useful work for their fellow-creatures—say, for the poor dumb animals they have so persecuted.

"The quaint old cruel coxcomb in his gullet, Should have a hook, and a small trout to pull it,"

(as Byron says of Izaak Walton). No interminable holiday of idleness after all! But, perhaps, by wishing very much to be annihilated, they might get a special dispensation, authorising them to shirk their share of whatever business may have to be done by somebody over there. There have been thinkers who thought such a thing not impossible. Only they say one ought to begin with self-effacement here; and some people don't seem in a hurry to do that! Spiritists, I suppose, would not be sorry not to meet their old enemies again! They might want to prosecute "for palmistry or otherwise" the mediums on the other side. And they will infallibly go about like the professorial ghost in Heine's story, demonstrating from chapter and verse in Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason," the self-contradiction inherent in the very notion of a ghost. In short, they will be as insufferable as Goethe told Eckermann the literary bore Tiedge would surely make himself in the after life, for he would buttonhole his sceptical acquaintances, with that tedious book of his on immortality in hand, asking, "Didn't I tell you so? Wasn't I right? Are we not immortal?" And poor Goethe half wished he might not have to live again, lest he should be condemned to meet this (spiritistic) friend in Heaven.

On the whole, indeed, it is more likely the Spiritists who will be so cock-a-whoop and tedious there, and lead the poor Positivists a life! I heartily hope they will. One must pay some penalty for such "cussedness," and why not this? Won't they have to listen then to plenty of "echoes of our gossip behind the veil"?

MATTER THROUGH MATTER.—Mr. Read, of Boston, has a solid ring of iron which has often been put upon my arm when his hand has been firmly clasped in mine. The experiment has succeeded as well with rings brought by investigators on my own arm and on theirs.—A Correspondent in "Facts."

PROFESSOR ELLIOTT COUES' DEFENCE OF SPIRITUAL INVESTIGATION.

The name and reputation of Professor Elliott Coues is well-known in the world of science, but our readers will remember him better in connection with his recent visit to England, and the interest shown in his book, "Biogenesis," an English edition of which, in conjunction with "M.A. (Oxon.)," he hoped to see through the press before leaving our shores. The accident, however, which has caused our contributor to cease active work, has, unfortunately, also indefinitely shelved the carrying out of this project.

Professor Coues, since his return to America, has strongly urged the necessity of research in psychical science; and he has, in addition, taken up the glove in its defence. The letters which we reproduce here from the Religio-Philosophical Journal were, as will be seen, originally contributed to Science and the New York Post. They speak for themselves, but we may remind our readers that Science is the same magazine which has lately earned what will, some day, prove an unenviable notoriety for a hastily-expressed à priori judgment on Spiritualism.

I beg to send you, with request for publication, a letter recently addressed to the editor of Science, which has been declined on the ground that "it is made up entirely of assertions to which no evidence is attached, and which are at the same time contrary, as far as is generally known, to the accepted laws of matter."

The operations of the London Society for Psychical Research have already placed certain obscure phenomena in a novel light, and have excited widespread interest. The fact of telepathy has been established, in my judgment, and now engages public attention through the medium of the Press. You have published several articles upon the subject; and Science is printing a correspondence between Mr. Gurney, Honorary Secretary of the London society, and Professor Newcomb, the distinguished astronomer. The latter asks, "Can ghosts be investigated?" I reply, "Yes," stating how these objects can be and are being investigated, and offering my own investigations in evidence. Science declines my letter on the above-mentioned grounds. My inference is, that Science thus prejudices the whole question, virtually proceeding upon the very premise that I guarded against, viz.: a preconceived theory of what is naturally possible and what is naturally impossible. If Science only publishes that which is "generally known and accepted," what service can it render to the progress of science? To decline my letter is to set itself dead against even a statement of what is to be investigated by the Society for Psychical Research, whose object is to examine things not "generally known and accepted." I must, therefore, characterise the attitude of Science as one eminently unscientific, and I will add anachronistic. Under these circumstances will the Evening Post do the subject justice?

ELLIOTT COUES.

To the Editor of Science.

SIR,—The simplest, safest, and most complete reply to this question, asked by Professor Newcomb in Science, No. 97, is, that thousands of the things called "ghosts" have been and are being investigated annually, monthly, weekly, daily, and perhaps hourly by thousands of persons of every grade of intelligence, from those who are most vulgar, ignorant, and credulous up to the most learned, intellectual, and sceptical of scientists. What these things are, is another question I do not here touch upon.

"Ghosts" can be, have been, and are being investigated by the several kinds of people indicated above, by the following methods:—

(a) By the natural exercise of the physical sense of smell. "Ghosts" frequently (not usually) emit a perceptible odour, sometimes very strong, sometimes fragrant, sometimes the reverse, nearly always peculiar to themselves.

(b) By the natural exercise of physical sense of sight, in the same way that the objectivity, reality, solidarity, size, shape, motion, &c., of other objects are perceived by the eye.

(c) By the natural exercise of the physical sense of hearing. Sounds proceeding from "ghosts," whether those that cannot be distinguished from the sound of the human voice, or those that result from contact with other objects, can be heard; (b) seeing "ghosts," and (c) hearing them talk, being the usual methods of "investigation" especially suitable for beginners in this line of experimental research.

(d) By the natural exercise of the physical sense of touch. "Ghosts" can frequently (not always, nor even usually) be felt and handled in any way that would be reasonably decorous in the case of a living person.

To recapitulate: "Ghosts" can be "investigated" by smelling, hearing, seeing, and touching them. There are also other methods, as follows:—

(e) By weighing these objects on any suitable platform scales, in the same way that any other object, as the investigator himself, might be weighed.

(f) By the physical, chemical, or microscopical examination of detached portions of them, as hair, nails, or pieces of any substance which may envelope them more or less completely.

All of which methods I myself, personally, have repeatedly and successfully employed in my own investigations, excepting (e), and I am ready to give the results of my experiments to any scientist, or to any other creditable person or body of persons who may wish to have them.

Among some of the "conditions" most essential to successful experiment in this difficult line of scientific research, I will mention—

1. Freedom of the mind of the investigator from any preconceived theory of the "natural possible" and the "natural impossible."

2. The constant co-operation of the object to be investigated.

Since Professor Newcomb has justly insisted upon the importance of mutual understanding in the use of words, let us see if we can agree upon a definition of that thing which each of us calls a "ghost" in our respective articles.

If, for example, Professor Newcomb and I should together see rise up out of the floor, immediately in front of us, a luminous vapour; if we should watch it intently and see it gradually condense and take the definite form of a human being, occupying say three minutes in the process; if then it should move about the room like a human being, and talk and act in all respects like one; and if we together touched and handled it; and if, during conversation with it and while our hands were upon it, the object should disintegrate itself, dissolve, and vanish; and if, upon comparing notes subsequently, we found that our observations tallied exactly—would Professor Newcomb agree with me to call that thing a "ghost"? That is what I mean by "ghost" in this letter; and I have investigated that kind of a thing, by the methods above stated, on many occasions, more or less satisfactorily and conclusively, sometimes with results in perfectly substantial accord with the hypothetical case I cite in illustration.

The term "ghost" is objectionable enough in this connection, for obvious reasons, one of which is that "ghost" ordinarily means an alleged apparition of a dead person; in short, a "spirit" in the concrete. To call the object I have described a "ghost" or "spirit" is to prejudge and pronounce upon what kind of an entity it is: this is unscientific. A better name is "veridical phantom," or "phantasm." Respecting such objects of investigation I will here say further:

(a) A veridical phantom is a substantial or material thing; an objective reality, possessing size, shape, solidity, gravity, and capacity for spontaneous motion and locomotion—qualities readily observed by the physical senses.

(b) The process of its gradual integration and disintegration may be watched, and the phantom may be handled during the process.

(c) The process of the gradual excretion or excretion of a veridical phantom from the body of a living person, and its subsequent reabsorption into the body of the same person, is one which may be watched, and the phantom may be handled during the process.

(d) Some persons, to my own most positive and unequivocal knowledge, have the power of causing a veridical phantom to issue from their own bodies, of their own conscious volition, and to measurably direct the movements and other actions of this phantom, producing visible and tangible effects at a distance from the place where their living physical bodies are at the time, and constituting a phenomenon known as "projection of the double"—one of the two principal kinds of what are called "phantasms of the living," the other kind being the issue of a similar phantom without the knowledge or volition of the individual.

The "investigation" of the above-described phenomena is as open to any one, of course, as it has been to me, during the several years that I have conducted my experiments with various persons both in Europe and in this country; the verification of my statements, or the proof that they have no foundation in fact, should be comparatively easy, by the methods I have indicated, or by others which a trained scientist like Professor Newcomb can readily devise.

Distinctly, I decline to commit myself now to any explanation of these phenomena. I decline at present to say even what I think, or believe, or suppose, their real nature to be. I simply assert and declare the objective reality of the things I have described; to answer the question, "Can ghosts be investigated?" Emphatically, and without reserve, I say "yes; veridical phantoms can be investigated."

ELLIOTT COVES.

SOME EXPERIENCES OF A MEDIUM.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal calls attention to an interesting sketch of the experience of Mrs. Burns, a medium resident in Chicago. The following is a summary:—

As with many others, my path as a medium has been not unstrewn with thorns; but I have, under trials and privations, striven to live down the thought in the public mind that a medium is less worthy of respect and esteem than other people.

When I came to Chicago I knew only one family resident in it, and my prospects were, for a time, dismal. I and my two young boys had a full share of nothing except faith. I have had my share, with all mediums, of bad names. An elder of a church here once used most insulting language to me. Only recently some ladies sent for me to give a materialisation séance, and when I came away some men of the party told me that their opinion was that I was a fraud. This was a thorn; but I brought away a rose also, in the recollection of having seen and caressed a sweet child materialised, and heard some delightful singing by a materialised spirit. Once an old man came: he said, "I'd give ten dollars to be told my mother's name; nobody in this country knows it but myself." In a few moments a name appeared on the slate. He looked at it; then he looked at me, saying, "There must be something wrong here; that's her name; but it came a little too quick." A lady came—a perfect stranger—wanting a test. On the slate appeared a message to her, addressing her by name as daughter. Then came communications from various members of her family. She said it was too wonderful; she supposed that I had, by some means, privately ascertained her name and family history; but was "not to be taken in." These are thorns. Others have not been satisfied because communications are not to their mind. Some came under the misapprehension that I can "call up" or "raise" their fathers and mothers. Such have to be borne with in charity.

My development as a medium was not like "getting religion." The independent slate-writing came only after sitting daily for it for three years.

I have never sought for what are called high controls. I have been satisfied with simple, faithful guides, such as the spirit of my brother, who—in earth-life—was most quiet and unpretending; he has always proved true, and has cheered me in hours of distress. On several occasions he has acted quite providentially.

Let us work with a will; let us try to develop into higher and purer mediumship, to show the world the truth of Spiritualism.

Money Challenge.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I suppose that many, like myself, who are interested in the public recognition of occult phenomena, read with inexpressible dismay the letter from Signor Damiani which was published by the Pall Mall Gazette on the 20th inst. I forbear comment upon it, for the objections to it are only too patent, and must have been felt by nearly every one for whom "LIGHT" is a representative organ. But you call on your readers for their opinions, with an object that can be easily understood. You wish that the disavowal of Signor Damiani's latest "challenge" should be generally and emphatically expressed and recorded in the interests of Spiritualism, or, as I should put it, of the scientific recognition of the phenomena, be they what they may.

It is difficult to understand upon what principle the Pall Mall Gazette has regulated its admission or rejection of letters on this whole subject. There is an attack in its columns on mediums generally, and on Mr. Eglinton in particular. The first letter in reply from this gentleman—a letter creditable alike to his intelligence, honour, and temper—is very properly published. It is not directly answered; but the torrent of abuse flows on. According to all journalistic usage Mr. Eglinton, as the person principally concerned, and as his character was assailed, was entitled to a rejoinder before the correspondence was closed. Yet his thoroughly pertinent and temperate letter of the 20th, which you published last week, is not allowed to go before the public in the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette.

Then with regard to Slade. We must be grateful to the Pall Mall for publishing Mr. Sinnett's forcible and telling retort upon Professor Lankester; and personally, I am obliged to the editor for even the partial publication of a letter from myself correcting certain misstatements by Mr. Labouchere. But why strike out just such facts—quite briefly stated—as are most important to be known for Slade's justification? Why forbid even the most summary reference to the experiments of Zöllner and his scientific colleagues, and to the evidence of the distinguished conjurer, Bellachini? When Slade's character as a medium is virulently assailed in a paper professing to let both sides be heard, surely those who, in a sense, represent Slade in this country are entitled to a somewhat fuller hearing. And then there is Signor Damiani, with his terribly compromising "challenge," adopted apparently by the editor as a representative of us all, none of us being allowed to protest in the same columns against that character. (I tried, for one.)

Upon the general question of money challenges in regard to the verification of these phenomena, I have not much to say. They seem to me peculiarly futile and imprudent. Futile, because in the end nobody knows exactly which side has backed out, by attempting to impose or by objecting to conditions. Imprudent, because every experienced investigator knows that the phenomena, even such as psychography, are not to be commanded on any given occasion or set of occasions; and because none of us know at all fully or accurately what are the conditions of success. As to "materialisations," we have usually to take them on the credit of the witnesses forming some specially select and confidential circle. In nine experiments out of ten at which I have been present in more miscellaneous assemblies, the physical identity of the form with the medium has been scarcely doubtful, though in many or most instances I believe the latter to have been unconscious of the deception. But that is too large a question to enter upon now.

C. C. M.

P.S.—I think it should be publicly stated that Mr. Eglinton was not a party to Signor Damiani's offer to exhibit our deceased friends in their "beautiful garments."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I was very glad to observe your firm criticism of the proposal made by Signor Damiani to Mr. Labouchere to demonstrate to him the reality of materialisation phenomena for a wager of £1,000.

Both proposals are injudicious, viz., the demonstration and the wager. These phenomena are not matters to be gambled about; they are facts for serious, scientific examination.

Signor Damiani, as a long continued practical investigator, knows perfectly well that spiritual phenomena of any kind cannot be commanded at will; he also knows that the more delicate the phenomena, the more sensitive and occult are the conditions. He also knows that many materialisations that are perfectly genuine are not conclusive to inexperienced investigators, and that not more than 10 per cent. of those ordinarily observed are under such conditions as to be absolutely conclusive.

All materialisations from cabinets have an element of doubt about them; and the only perfectly conclusive development of psychic materialisation is when the medium is visibly among the sitters, when the psychic forms grow up in the middle of the room from apparent nothingness, walk, speak, write, and shake hands with the sitters, and gradually become invisible, and when all present clearly see and hear the phenomena as they occur.

Experiments of that kind are not at the direct command of any one; they require much patience to witness them, and a judicial mind to interpret them, and I shrewdly suspect Mr. Labouchere has not either.

I have witnessed many materialisation and slate-writing experiments, and have no more doubts of their reality and genuineness than I have of the folly and prejudice recently displayed by the editor of Truth.—I am, &c.,

Newcastle-on-Tyne,

January 23rd, 1885.

T. P. BARKAS.

The Cry of the Hungry.

SIR,—I willingly join in your protest against any course of action which would tend to stifle investigation. But, none the less, I agree with the editor of Truth in thinking that it is high time that Mr. Eglinton were taken in hand. Only I would not choose Professor Ray Lankester as the investigator. His method lacks delicacy even for the mere qualitative analysis of psychical phenomena.

What puzzles me is this: on the one hand, we have a gentleman professing to be able to exercise almost at will a marvellous power quite out of the range of known physical forces; and on the other hand, we have a Society which exists for the express purpose of investigating, according to scientific methods, the alleged manifestations of such a power; but yet these two, the medium and the Society, have not yet managed to hit it off together.

I should very much like to know the reason of this. Which is shy of the other? Is the force afraid of scientific method, or is the Society unequal to grappling with the force? It is these little hitches that are so perplexing in connection with the occult. We are inundated with Spiritualistic literature which would all be very interesting, if we could just get our little modicum of fact to start with. But, whenever I have hungrily asked for a fact, I have been given—a dark séance; and now, just when it seemed as if Spiritualism were at last emerging into the light, and one could get something solid to work upon, there seems, after all, to be something wrong about it.

Of course, I shall be told that I may go to Mr. Eglinton and convince myself. But I would rather the investigation were conducted scientifically. Seeing, even in broad daylight, is not necessarily believing. So far, the Society for Psychical Research has done its work well. It has been rigorous in its tests, and for this reason its work, unlike that of most former investigators, will stand. And I should prefer their opinion to Mr. Eglinton to my own, especially as I have no reason to expect that I should be allowed to secure certainty by special tests.

In fine, if Mr. Eglinton can really command an occult force, it is a thousand pities that the fact is not, once for all, scientifically demonstrated. When demonstrated, it would be no proof whatever of the interference of spirits, but in itself it would be a priceless addition to human knowledge.—Faithfully yours,

New Athenæum Club, S.W.

A. EUBULE-EVANS.

[Our correspondent is somewhat in error. Mr. Eglinton does not claim to "exercise at will" a marvellous power. He is merely a passive agent. Further, Mr. Eubule-Evans would, like many others, be allowed perfect liberty to "secure certainty by special tests." Mr. Eglinton refuses no request in moderation preferred in a truth-seeking spirit. The "fact" has been over and over again scientifically demonstrated, and yet the world is credulous: so they would remain, even if the Society for Psychical Research reported in favour of psychography. The truth is, these matters cannot be generally received on authority.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]

The Public Discussion of Spiritualism.

SIR,—Mr. Podmore's criticism of my remarks on this subject, and of the Greek sentence written by a spirit in my study, upon marked paper and under fairly good test conditions, has had my attention. I presume both of us wish to be accurate in our statement of facts, irrespective of preconceived opinions. In my paper, to which Mr. Podmore calls the further attention of your readers, I recorded certain facts—all I knew—relating to this Greek writing, but Mr. Podmore says:—

"Mr. Theobald has omitted to mention that the spirit ascribed the quotation—which is prose, and could not be mistaken by the veriest tyro in Greek for anything else—to the first book of the Odyssey. Now the Odyssey is a poem; and the first book of the Odyssey contains no allusion to Ulysses' encounter with the Cyclops."

It would have been very surprising, considering my anxiety in all such narrations to be accurate and to give your readers all that can throw light upon these phenomena, if I had made any such statement, for the simple reason that the idea exists nowhere but in Mr. Podmore's imagination! I can explain how this misapprehension arose. When I wrote to Mr. Podmore thereon, I asked him to look into the first book of the Odyssey (it should have been the 9th), somewhere about lines 366-410; but he was entirely wrong when he drew the conclusion that the spirit referred me there. It was from a Greek scholar I had that reference. He was clearly mistaken. All the spirit has said is to be found recorded in the P.S. of my paper. What the "other facts," elsewhere referred to by Mr. Podmore, are, I know not.

As I have said before, I am not a Greek scholar. Had I been one, any inaccuracy in my transcription would not have occurred; but as I wished Mr. Podmore's criticism of the Greek also to be passed under review, I took it to a friend whom Mr. Podmore knows and would consider equally able to form an opinion of the writing as he is. This friend is not only a Greek scholar but a Spiritualist, and the result of an hour's crucial examination of the original, of which I am glad Mr. Podmore has a copy, is to convince me that a Spiritualist who knows Greek will look upon the writing

"With larger, other eyes than ours,
To make allowance for us all,"

and for the conditions under which these writings are done. My friend reads the word I have deciphered Outo as Outin, and with the aid of his "other eyes" I can take this reading and thus make it correct: it can clearly be so read, and therefore we can give the benefit of the doubt on the side of accuracy. He also reads proton, as I have printed it, correctly. He agrees with my note on the word Odusca. He considers some of the letters of antique form and Mr. Podmore's criticism thereof unimportant, and in one case wholly wrong.

But whether the Greek is correct or not appears to me of small import by the side of the phenomenon itself—a Greek sentence written between eleven o'clock at night and eight in the morning, on marked paper, in a house where no one could have written it, excepting, perhaps, myself (who could have copied it, as I wrote Greek when at school). But as, according to Mr. Podmore, men stands first, in an impossible position, he probably may have other facts to explain how it was done. He must, however, be more careful in his statement of facts than he has been in this instance.—Yours faithfully,

January 25th, 1885.

MORELL THEOBALD.

Spiritism has lost one of its best disciples in Colonel Devolut, a commander in the Legion of Honour. In anticipation of his departure, he had prepared the customary notes of invitation to his funeral, but without the usual broad, black border, ending with the words: "The departed asks for your affectionate remembrance." This departure from antiquated custom is quite in accordance with our sentiments, and we hope to see the example followed in the families of all our co-disciples.—La Lumière.

INVESTIGATION AND INVESTIGATION.

There are a few persons in this world who profess, in some degree, to have investigated the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, among whom, without intended offence, may be classed Huxley, Tyndall, Carpenter, and Lankester.

Their investigation has consisted in attending less than half-a-dozen experiments, and their conclusions, some of which have been published, consist of crude and manifestly prejudiced inferences, deduced from a very limited number of seances, at which the phenomena appear to have been of a very elementary kind, and in which the skill of the quartette of scientists has been displayed in attempts to thwart the manifestations rather than to give psychics and phenomena a fair field, and after careful observation to arrive at any decision, favourable or unfavourable, legitimately proven by what they observed.

Dr. Carpenter, in his Eozoölogical researches, places his own phenomena and facts before his critics. He gathers his own specimens, employs his own lapidary, prepares his own sections, uses his own microscope and modes of illumination, solicits his critics to examine his preparations in his own way, and despite their affirmation that his specimens give no satisfactory evidence of organic structure, continues to affirm his protozoöan theories.

Professor Huxley, in his scientific controversy with Professor Owen and others, on, say, the structure of the brain of the chimpanzee and that of man, procures his own chimpanzee, takes the bony case from the brain, places the brain in normal situ, and in that way demonstrates to his brother professors that the cerebrum in the chimpanzee covers the cerebellum as does the cerebrum in man.

Professor Tyndall, in his celebrated experiments on biogenetic phenomena, does not trust his experiments to the manipulation of any conceited stranger with a foregone conclusion in his inexperienced brain, but provides his own animal or vegetable fluid infusions, sterilizes them himself by high heat, places them in absolutely pure air, carefully hermetically seals them under his own inspection, and, after years of patient experiment and observation, arrives at the conclusion that living forms, at present, only spring from living matter, and that under test conditions non-living matter will never produce living organisms.

Dr. Lankester, in his more youthful, and, probably, more impulsive researches, tests the phenomena of nature, and having found certain conditions necessary for their production declines to accept the non-validity of his conclusions, except by processes which he himself has conducted, and in which he has observed contrary results.

In every case the four above-named scientists are indisputably correct, but when their attention is directed to a series of occult phenomena which they have not carefully examined, and respecting which they are practically ignorant, they demand their own conditions, refuse to accept the reasonable experimental conditions of psychics and their friends, and in their crass folly refuse impartially to examine phenomena with which they are unacquainted, and of the laws regulating which they know nothing; unless such phenomena are produced under their own conditions, and at their personal dictation.

What would Professor Tyndall say to the conceited dogmatist who declined to witness his electrical experiments unless he produced them freely in a damp room? He, if not in a mild and placable mood, would order him out of his presence, or have him conveyed to an insane asylum. Why should electrical experiments and psychographic experiments be treated differently? Both are produced by occult, invisible, incomprehensible forces; both require certain conditions; those who have investigated the conditions best understand them, and the duty of an honest, unprejudiced and judicial investigator is to observe the phenomena under the conditions in which they have been produced, and ascertain if they remove all reasonable chances of error or deception.

If psychical phenomena be thus reasonably approached, the result is not difficult to predict. Phenomena are the laws of Nature; they are the modes in which she speaks, and the language of psychographic phenomena waits for rational interpretation.

TRANSITION OF MRS. MARY E. RICH.

Just as we go to press, we learn from our American exchanges that on the last evening of the old year, surrounded by loving friends, the beloved young wife of Mr. Isaac B. Rich, of the publishing house of Colby and Rich, passed to spirit life from the Revere House, Boston. A devoted husband, a sweet little daughter of six years of age, a father and five brothers and sisters, together with a wide circle of friends, mourn her departure. In the name of our readers, and all English Spiritualists, we tender our profoundest sympathy to the bereaved family circle.

NEW BOOKS.—A short list of recent publications will be found in another column.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—It is proposed to hold the next conversazione of this Society on Thursday, February 26th. In the course of the evening an address will be delivered by Miss Rosamond Dale Owen. Full particulars will appear in due course.

"M. A. (Oxon's)" ILLNESS.—There is a steady improvement, with some relapses and paroxysms of pain. On the whole, the progress is well marked, and the strength is sustained, the appetite having returned. The patient still keeps his bed, and must do so, from mere weakness, for some time to come. But the violence of the disease is spent.

THE truest love is the truest benevolence; it acquires an infinite patience out of the very excess of its suffering, and is content to merge its egotism in the idea of the beloved object. He that does not know this, does not know what love is, whatever he may know of passion.

MATTER THROUGH MATTER.

When Galileo discovered by means of his telescope that there were satellites circulating round Jupiter, the scientific men of the day refused to look through his telescope, but sitting down in their cells wrote elaborate treatises to show how Galileo must be a deluded being, if not an impostor, as mathematically such satellites were impossible.

Now, I feel a little as if Mr. Gurney were placing himself in a like position with these critics, for while some members of the Society for Psychical Research have called on me to question me fairly on my ring experiment and to inspect my ring, Mr. Gurney, on the other hand, has hitherto in this matter, not seen either myself or my ring, but has preferred freely to exercise his critical faculty. Now, had he examined me and my ring personally I think he would not have written either of his late criticisms.

Mr. Gurney still calls in question my ability to judge as to the identity of my own ring, and says, "I do not see the difficulty of imitating [successfully] 1,000 minute marks [on my ring], for a person who has a pin and a few hours at his disposal."

It is quite unnecessary that I should characterise this sentence verbally, but I will now offer Mr. Gurney £20 if in "a few hours," with a pin, he successfully imitates any one minute mark I shall indicate, such, for instance, as the indentation caused by the blow of a hammer, out of the 1,000 existing marks on my ring, provided he will give me, should he fail, one shilling!

Mr. Gurney objects to my describing my experiment as a demonstration. But I maintain that to myself it was a demonstration both to my senses and to my reason, and to others a logical demonstration. As thus—

1. I have a ring made of hammered iron, and of a special size and form, so as to render its passage over Mr. Husk's hand, so far as one could judge by measurement and by experiment, impossible.

2. I grasp the medium's hand, and am absolutely certain I never for an instant relax my grasp during the experiment, which lasted altogether only about, apparently, one minute.

3. I then examine the medium's wrist and forearm, and satisfy myself that there is no ring thereon.

4. Immediately afterwards I find a ring on the medium's wrist.

5. I call for a light, and on minute examination, find all my (all but invisible) private marks on the ring, and am absolutely certain the ring is my own ring, and is intact.

I think, therefore, I am entitled to describe my experiment as a demonstration, complete and without flaw.

I will now add the supplementary evidence I obtained on the evening of the 22nd inst., and again at the house of Mr. Stuart-Menteath; Captain James, the Rev. Mr. Newbould, myself, and other friends being present.

At the end of our seance, "Irresistible" said, "If Mr. Newbould will now hold the medium's hand, I will try and give Dr. Wyld more evidence."

Accordingly, having obtained permission to light a candle, all present saw Mr. Newbould, with his right hand, take a firm hold of the medium's left hand. After he had done so, I, having during the whole of the seance kept my ring in my breast pocket, now produced it and put it into Mr. Newbould's left hand, and, he being now urged not for a moment to relax his grasp, we extinguished the light. "Irresistible" now went to work, and having asked Mr. Newbould to rise from his chair, placed on Husk's wrist not only a ring, but the frame of the chair Mr. Newbould had just risen from.

Light being now produced, I examined the ring on the medium's wrist and was absolutely certain it was my own ring, and is intact.

Having now both hands free, I pulled up the sleeves of Mr. Husk's shirt and coat and found that it was impossible to urge my ring beyond the beginning of the thick part of his arm. This was an important observation, because it proved that my ring, during the first experiment, could not possibly have been higher up the arm than the part I examined.

This brief experiment is so far more satisfactory than the first experiment inasmuch as we were permitted light to satisfy all present as to the status quo immediately before the act.

We asked Mr. Newbould if he was certain he never relinquished his grasp of the medium's hand, and he replied: "I am not more certain of my existence than I am that I did not relinquish my grasp for an instant."

I admit, however, that "the passage of matter through matter" is a fact which can scarcely be received by thoughtful minds on testimony however strong, except there be preliminary experiences of a cognate character. And I confess that although I have had a great many of these experiences, I am only now able to say, "I know that 'the passage of matter through matter,' is a fact."

But if we grant the fact, what is the possible interpretation?

The scientific view is, that matter is composed of ultimate atoms of infinite smallness, held in close proximity by the cohesive force, which force probably is the attraction of magnetic polarity. But although these atoms are more or less in proximity, the theory is that they do not touch but are free to move with unknown velocity in all directions.

If so, then all that may be required still further to separate these atoms from each other is to reverse the polarity, or perhaps only to relax the electric tension.

Spiritual beings assert that they have the power of controlling magnetic forces, and can thus disintegrate and reconstruct matter. True, the beings who thus speak, do not generally impress us with the idea of their superior wisdom or knowledge; but as they all are unanimous in asserting that the will of spiritual beings can control the forces of magnetism, and as this assertion is accompanied by a demonstration that they can pass "matter through matter," as if said matter became liquid or gaseous, their assertion, with the facts, demands the sincerest examination of scientific minds.

Theosophy teaches that the external universe is only an objective reflection of the Divine Will. It teaches further that man in his innermost essence is identical in substance with the All-Spirit. If so, then logically, he should, as a spiritual being, be able, by concentrating his will on a limited portion of matter, to control the attractive force, and thus to increase or diminish the interspaces between the atoms of an iron ring.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

In saying of the ring experiment "it seems to me that either the arm or the substance of the ring must have been temporarily disintegrated, merely because we have no other means of explaining the mystery," Mr. Keulemans overlooks the fourth dimensional hypothesis of Zollner. According to that there would have been no passage of ring through arm, or vice versa, because for four-dimensional space the arm would not be a solid body. The operation could then only be seen by a four-dimensional vision, to which it would appear as simple as possible. What we could conceivably see of it would be just this: The ring or part of it would become suddenly invisible, such part immediately reappearing on the inside of the arm. It is, to my mind, not only possible, but probable, that there exist beings which have not evolved the sense, or rather the judgment, of the third dimension. As Zollner shows, we should simply have to raise an object and pass it across a line to perform what, for such beings, would be the "stupendous miracle" of matter through matter. Nor in our case are we obliged to credit the "Irresistibles" with a knowledge of the fourth-dimensional process. "It is by no means necessary," says Zöllner—"nay, not even probable—that such beings should have a contemplative consciousness of these actions of their wills." He illustrates that by our own experience. We ourselves execute movements in the third dimension, instinctively, but we only attain to a conception of the third dimension by reflection according to the law or function of causality. Anterior to this most primitive reflection, mere sense can give us no intimation of more than one plane. The child sees its hand; it stretches it out. The feeling of the hand remains the same; there is therefore for it an identical object. But the visual appearance of this object is now different. That is a problem for the child's thought, and it is solved through the subjective necessity of the causal law giving the conception of a second plane to account for the phenomenon. The judgment becoming instantaneous by habit is confounded with sense perception. The same process is made evident to mature experience by the example of the stereoscope. "The representation of the corporeality—i.e., of the third dimension—springs up in our mind when the task is presented to our intellect to refer at once two different plane pictures, without contradiction, to one single object." We are not actually conscious of this process, just because it is a necessary intellectual act, an à priori function brought into play by sense.

We should first explain "Irresistible" before we call on "Irresistible" to explain his or its performances. If the fourth dimension is for ourselves only an affair of evolution, that means for the personal consciousness; the larger, deeper, Subject underlying that, which in the case of mediums projects effects, but not explanations of them, above the threshold of consciousness, can act from another space than ours. But obediently to the law of causality, the personal consciousness will have its hypothesis; an hypothesis not wrought by self-conscious reflection, but which is the concept of cause conereted by the mental ideality of the medium, clothing itself by an unobserved spontaneity in a ready-made category of personality, and springing at once, like any other dream image, into apparent life and reality. We owe to Du Prel the observation, that dream, though of transcendental origin, from below the threshold, must for consciousness above the threshold take on the imagery to be found there. The illusion is thus in the form of the phenomenon, not in the phenomenon itself. The transcendental Subject passes its knowledge into the personal consciousness in the only way it can, by the assumption of an illusory personality. And I do not see why the same should not occur in relation to transcendental acts; or rather, given such acts by our own Subject, the causal necessity of our understanding demanding an actor, the latter must be such for it as it can represent, a distinct individual, or "spirit."

But descending from these speculative heights, I owe it in candour to Mr. Gurney to admit that, to my mind at least, he has hit a blot in the evidence—at least, a defect—unless Dr. Wyld can further reassure us. Was the ring which fell down after the séance, and which is now available for examination, the same ring that was on the wrist? That is a question which does legitimately arise on the evidence as it stands. For I must doubt, with Mr. Gurney, whether the solidity of the rim of the ring could be conclusively tested while it was on the wrist. In my own mind it is not at all a question of doubting the phenomenon; I would lay 100 to 1 that it was genuine. But we must not confound subjective judgments with objective ones. I have seen the ring in Dr. Wyld's possession, and if the general appearance of the one found on the wrist was the same, though Dr. Wyld had no photographic chart to go by, I can easily suppose that his familiarity with all those old dints and rust-marks makes the suggestion of a fac-simile to his mind very absurd. It is rather absurd to my own, but we have no right to call it impossible.

C. C. M.

I should like to suggest a simple experiment which, if it could be brought to a successful issue, would conclusively demonstrate the possibility of the "passage of matter through matter"—that is, matter as cognised by our present senses.

Take a piece of chamois leather and cut out of it two rings, one within another; if they are rather irregular and jagged so much the better. It can always be shown that these rings must originally have formed one piece of leather, for no art could imitate the continuous texture of the natural skin when the rings are placed so that their edges coincide. If some powerful physical medium, in the habit of producing ring phenomena, succeeded in linking these leather rings together, it would be evidence that Professor Ray Lankester, Mr. Labouchere, the members of the Royal Society, and the entire fraternity of conjurers could not upset. No darkened cabinet, or mystery as to the modus operandi, would make the slightest difference with regard to the fact of the solid rings having been passed through each other. What the explanation might be would still remain an open question—whether the disintegration and reintegration of matter, a fourth dimension of space, or some other hypothesis not yet propounded.

Another conclusive experiment would be to tie a knot in an endless cord of soft leather, such as Slade tied in a cord the ends of which were fastened with sealing wax.

LOUISA S. COOK.

ON CREDENCE TO SPIRITS.

(Extracted from the Religio-Philosophical Journal.)

Spiritualists should be careful to discriminate between sensitiveness and mediumship. Mediums are, of course, always sensitives; but it does not follow that sensitives are mediums. Neither are those who are really mediums always in such a condition as to enable spirits to manifest themselves through them; if they, then, urged by importunity, and perhaps by their needs, hold séances, they serve only as mirrors to reflect what comes to them from their immediate mundane environment.

Mediumship, if not conjoined with disciplined will, cannot but lead to error and disaster. Sensitive mediums who do not discipline the will, maintain self-respect, and lead an orderly life, are in constant danger of passing over the boundary line of sanity.

If any of our friends would consult a spirit upon any religious, literary, or business question, let them not be guided except under test conditions. Let what comes through one medium be compared with what comes through another, or others. If it is found that the assumed communicating spirit maintains his identity, that he gives expression to the same ideas, that he repeats through one medium what he has said through another, or others, it may then be reasonably believed that a spirit has really communicated, and his communication is worthy of just that deference which would have been given to his words when in the earth-life, and no more.

THE Beacon Light is the title of a new publication, at a dollar a-year, edited by a medium, Mrs. M. E. Williams, of Boston. The editor of Facts calls it a jewel, and says it ought to succeed well.

On the question of supporting mediums, M. Helleberg, of Cincinnati, U.S.A., writes: "We have a medium here, a young man named Swannberg, who was a blacksmith, but who, under spirit-guidance, has relinquished his business to be a professional medium, receiving small fees in payment for the time he devotes to séances. It is said that he has converted hundreds who belonged to his Church—the Roman Catholic."—La Lumière.

ON THE URGENCY FOR INVESTIGATION.

(Extracted from the Philadelphia Press.)

A large sum was bequeathed by the late Mr. Henry Sybert to the University of Pennsylvania, on the condition that it should cause a full scientific investigation to be made of Spiritualism. The University has now appointed for that purpose a committee of prominent literary and scientific men of Philadelphia. And not too soon. It is high time that Spiritualism should receive a full irradiation from the cold, searching light of science. For nearly forty years it has been an increasingly active element in our social and religious world. The journals promulgating it are numbered by the hundreds, and its adherents by the hundreds of thousands. If it is all error, it is not to be dissipated by sneers; if there is a truth in it, it is neither becoming nor judicious to treat it with heedless disregard.

The possibility of the return of the dead—the key-note of Spiritualism—appeals to the tenderest feelings of men and women; people come to the consideration of it blinded by grief and hope. These feelings have, no doubt, been traded upon by tricksters who have called themselves mediums; but this is not, as the world goes, very surprising. But are there phenomena which such tricksters only imitate? Is the mediumship which they pretend to be endowed with a real natural endowment in some individuals?

The belief is extending that under the haze of Spiritualism, Animal Magnetism, Clairvoyance, Telepathy, &c., there is something beyond trickery, but which—whether it be some hitherto uncomprehended physical force, or psychical force—calls for conscientious research similar to that which is given to the other natural phenomena.

The present is an age when all things are proved and reduced to scientific classification. A century ago men shuddered, or jeered, at the notion of ghosts; educated men now neither shudder nor jeer at anything. They will not be startled nor astonished at any disclosure of an invisible world about them; but they will insist that it must be conformable with law and rational system.

Whatever of definable truth there is in Spiritualism will be elicited when scientific men take its investigation in hand. In England a beginning has been made; a Society for Psychical Research has been formed, and has already accumulated a mass of facts for scientific investigation and classification.

That there are invisible beings in the universe reaching up beyond us, just as the ranks of created beings stretch downwards from us to the microbe; and that the mysteries which now and then touch us, "striking the electric chain with which we are darkly bound," should be making efforts to communicate with us, does not appear absurd to the majority of men and women. It should be for scientists to demonstrate its absurdity—if such it be—and brush such mental cobwebs out of the way. It is they only who can do it. And there ought to be no difficulty in the matter. Unseen powers would, doubtless, be glad to meet science half-way in the inquiry; and honest mediums would be glad to meet every test. If Spiritualism is falsity and delusion, let us have it proved; if there is truth in it, let us have it, be the result what it may.

THE Echo d'Ostende reports that last Sunday the De Rots Society of Spiritists opened a new hall in the Chaussée de Thouront, due to the liberality of one of its members. Among the eighty persons present were some of our best-known citizens. After the business opening, the prayer used at opening séances was read. Then communications were written through mediums, and read to the audience. Some addresses were delivered, and the ceremony was closed by the reading of the prayer used for the closing of the séance. In an adjoining room was a collection of spirit-drawings, which was visited by many, and was to remain open for a week.—Le Messager.

THE REVUE SPIRITE'S RETROSPECT OF 1884

The Revue Spirite says, in its retrospect of the past year, that the signs of extension of the spiritual movement are manifest all over Europe. Even in obscurantist Rome a spiritual journal has been established. The movement now includes Athens, in Greece, and Alexandria, in Egypt.

In France its expansion is augmented by the organisation of a movement for the delivery of lectures. The year has been prolific in works published in many parts of Europe, bearing indirectly, when not directly, upon the spiritual philosophy; pages might be filled with the enumeration of them and their contents. Forty new ones are on sale at the offices of the Revue. It comments on the fact of some prominent men of science at Nancy having reported to their society the results of a conscientious investigation of "The action of the mind of one individual upon another; and upon cures by magnetisation and the use of magnetised water."

The Revue again calls attention to the tendency to federation indicated by the formation of "Spiritualist Alliances" in England and America, with both of which the French Spiritists are in friendly relation. It gives a full report of Major-General Drayson's address to the London Spiritualist Alliance, translated by Professor Cassal.

HEALING MEDIUMSHIP.

The following extracts are from Le Spiritisme of January:—

"Last May the widow Somerfeld, at Villette, had been suffering from acute sciatica for two months, against which medical treatment had been totally ineffective. By spiritual magnetisation, through me as medium, in four sittings she was entirely cured.

"The widow Lang had suffered for nine years from abdominal tumour, and latterly also from vomitings, which prostrated her for days together. Of the latter she was, by the same means, at once relieved, and in six weeks of the tumour also.

"I state these facts in the hope that the knowledge of them may help to spread the spiritual doctrine.—M. A. DIEX."

Madame Agullena writes: "I had been suffering seriously for six years, and the Bordeaux doctors could do nothing more in my case. Through the kind treatment of Madame Colignon and M. Brisse I was quite restored, and continue well after a year. My husband wanted to make remuneration, but M. Brisse said that the only remuneration that he asked for was that I would help him in the cure of others; for while treating me he had ascertained that I was a clairvoyante, with the gift of healing. This I willingly agreed to. Our latest cure is of a man who had been a sufferer for fourteen years from sciatica, and could not walk without help. His cure was complete."

At the civil funeral of M. Guichard, Dean of the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Spuller, one of its eminent members, in his oration said that the departed had desired that his remains should be laid in the tomb with civil rites only, not as an anti-religious manifestation, but because he believed that when a man was conscious of having lived a well-ordered life here, he should, at its close, declare the principles which had inspired him. He then read the deceased's last testament, which was drawn up on the anniversary of his wife's death a year before. It concluded thus: "I believe in God, supreme intelligence, sovereign rule of life; in the continuance of life after death; and in the providential recompense of those who live in the love of their fellow creatures, and of their duty. I desire, in accordance with the law-guaranteeing freedom of religious opinion, that no minister of any denomination whatever may officiate at my funeral; and that these lines may be there read, in order that it may be known in what faith my beloved wife and I lived and died."—Revue Spirite.—The Revue adds that M. Guichard was ever at work in the spirit of his profession of faith, and that there are many other deputies and senators, silent friends of modern Spiritualism, who might make a similar declaration.

THE MANCHESTER EVENING NEWS ON SPIRITUALISM.

The "London Correspondent" of this provincial daily wrote as follows on January 16th:—

It is to be regretted that Mr. Labouchere, and equally with him his friend Professor Lankester, cannot discuss the question of Spiritualism without making use of expressions which are not usual in well-conducted society. To call an opponent a "scoundrel," a "swindler," and a "rogue," may be hard hitting, but it is not good manners. The failure of negotiations between Mr. Labouchere and Professor Damiani for a test of Mr. Eglinton's spiritualistic powers leads many people to think that the former gentleman is not quite so confident in his anti-spiritualist views as he would have us believe. Anent this matter I heard a story from the best authority which, perhaps, is worth repeating. A short time ago Mr. Eglinton held a séance, at which some eight or ten gentlemen, including Professor Damiani, were present. One gentleman took his own slates with him, two hinged, forming a double slate, and two unhinged, which were stamped with his own name, and he made what he considers to be a conclusive test. With his own hand he wrote upon one of the hinged slates an inquiry to his deceased father—no one else in the room knew what the question was. A piece of slate pencil, far too small for human fingers to write with, was placed between the double slates. The slates were then put upon the table, the gentleman kept his hand upon them and never allowed them to leave his presence. After a while they were opened and a short reply was found written upon the opposite slate to that containing the question. This reply was not so specific as the gentleman desired, and, accordingly, the question was again written on one of the common slates, a piece of pencil put upon it and then the other slate bound over it with tape. Mr. Eglinton never manipulated the slates at all, and they never left the sight of the operator and his witnesses. Presently the pencil was heard moving, and when the slates were untied there was a specific answer to the question, which question was not known to anyone in the room save the person who wrote it. Mr. Eglinton, when it was over, said he had scarcely ever done anything which had exhausted him more, and his appearance, after the second question had been answered, was that of a man thoroughly prostrated by fatigue.

The gentleman who submitted Mr. Eglinton to this test, considers it to have been conclusive, inasmuch as it was impossible for there to have been any tampering with the slates, which never left his sight or possession. I may say that he is a pharmaceutical chemist, highly educated, and a man who has travelled about the world a very great deal. Certainly he is not one upon whom it would be easy to impose.

The only circumstance connected with this experiment which, to my mind, is open to objection, is the nature of the question asked. It was to the effect that, inasmuch as the questioner, being an elderly man, could not, in the course of nature, hope to live much longer, was it probable that he, on his entrance into the spirit world, would be met by his father and mother, who had preceded him thither? The answer to this was a general affirmative, but he was not satisfied with it, and desired a more specific reply. The second reply gave a definite promise that both his father and mother would meet him directly on his entrance, after death, into the spirit world. The objection to questions of this kind is that there exist no means of testing the truth of the answer. It would have been better if the question had been one relating to some mundane matter known only in the questioner's private family, the truth of which could have been easily ascertained.

THE Reformador, Rio Janeiro, September 15th, says: "In ours of July 1st we spoke of the Jesuit Father Curci, once a high dignitary of the Church, having, at eighty years of age, published his 'Il Vaticano Regio,' in which he renounces the errors of Romanism. We looked for the Vatican theologians pulverising his book with their logic; but no! Instead of this being attempted, Rome has risen in its antiquated pomp, and commanded its subjects, under pain of excommunication, to burn Curci's book, and not read it! Well, this method of dealing with a book is convenient, but it is not effective in these days. This excommunication—once a really formidable business—now makes men smile and shrug their shoulders." It is pleasant to see a Portuguese-speaking people, once so docile in the hands of Popes, so radically changing, as the article in the Reformador implies.—Le Messenger.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK. XIV.

"One Thousand Pounds Reward" is an attractive heading to an advertisement, but whether it should be used to call attention to the facts of Spiritualism may be a matter of taste. Every bet is the offer of a reward depending upon some contingency. Financial and commercial speculations have much of the same character. Men back their opinions—but the question arises whether it is ever justifiable to make a wager upon a fact which you know, and your opponent denies without knowledge. Is it right to mulct a man for his ignorance? If you know which horse will win the Derby, would not every bet you make be a theft?

Something is to be said on the other side, no doubt. If a man, who ought to know better, persists in denying well established facts, carefully examined by, and well known to, many creditable persons, he deserves to be punished a little for his unwisdom. A man who shuts his eyes in the street will not be pitied if he run against a lamp-post. A man who stupidly denies a fact of scientific interest deserves to suffer whatever such folly may inflict.

After all, these matters settle themselves better, perhaps, than we could arrange them by any calculation or effort. A life to come has its interest for millions. "Modern Spiritualism" is not forty years old; and it is as well known in Australia as in America. No really intelligent person doubts the reality of its phenomena. If some people, full of prejudice and conceit, choose to deny its facts without taking the trouble to examine them, why not let them enjoy their folly and their wilful ignorance? Why propose wagers or offer rewards?

I do not go the length of some who throw up the subject in disgust because ten or a hundred seek pleasure in this life for one who will take any trouble to learn the truth about another existence. The excuse for this neglect that every one will know all about Spiritualism when they pass to the life to come, and therefore they need not bother about the ignorant and wilful who deny it, does not commend itself to me.

That kind of logic may do for the Laboucheres and the Lankesters, the Huxleys and Tyndalls. Their ignorance is wilful, and they deserve all their "hardness of heart and blindness of mind." People who shut their eyes and fasten them in darkness with a pitch plaister of prejudice deserve just what they get by it; but there may be some further punishment—some bitterness of remorse for using their influence to keep others in darkness. When "the blind lead the blind and both fall into the ditch," the one who might have seen if he had opened his eyes may have some compunction.

Mr. Labouchere says that the best judges of the genuineness of spirit manifestations are the conjurers. The natural reply is that several prestidigitateurs of repute have frankly borne testimony to the reality of the phenomena. But there are conjurers and conjurers, even as there are investigators and investigators; and there is no disinclination on Mr. Eglinton's part, or for the matter of that, on the part of most mediums, to meet any honest inquirer, whether he is conjurer or not. All I say is that the conjurers to be excluded from a jury to try the manifestations are those who have made a business of exposing Spiritualism. Of course the Andersons, the Maskelynes and Cookes, the Bishops and Cumberlands, could not sit on it. But any honest conjurer would be a good judge because he knows the limits of his own art.

So of ventriloquism. Its possible illusions are comprised in a narrow limit well known to those who practise it. Conversations with materialised spirits have no relation to them. When a materialised spirit comes to you in your own home, takes you by the hand and talks with you, no conjuring or ventriloquism can account for the manifestation—for what you see, and hear, and feel. How is a conjurer and ventriloquist to personate your departed friend or relative whom he never saw, and of whom he could have no knowledge? The husband talks with his departed wife, the father with the son or daughter, whom the medium never knew, and of whose personality no one present except the husband or father had any knowledge.

All we Spiritualists have to do is to give the knowledge we have gained of the other world to those who are ready to receive it. The testimony to the reality of spiritual phenomena is completely overwhelming. I do not see how any one can read the statements of such men as Crookes, Zollner, Wallace, Dunraven, Balcarres, and a score of similarly scientific and distinguished witnesses, without at least coming to the conviction that there are facts in Spiritualism worthy of their attention.

Further, we may say, without giving reasonable offence, that any one who is not convinced by the testimony within his reach,—the phenomena he may observe with little trouble—is not worth convincing. The beliefs of numbers of persons are of no more importance than their understandings. The man who cannot see that two and two make four may as well give up the exact sciences.

There is now the possibility of getting some news from Thibet—as the first official communication for one hundred years has lately been made to the British Government, with an application for a dictionary phrase-book. The infant in whom the Tashu Lama is born will soon be identified, and our Government will naturally send an embassy with congratulations in the interests of trade; in which case we may possibly hear more of Koot Hoomi, and other personages known to Theosophists.

The Messenger (January 15th) records a proposed exposé of Spiritualism at Brussels on the 7th and 8th inst. M. Charles Bellini, it appears, announced two séances in which he would appear as an anti-Spiritualist, to unmask the tricks of the mediums. He was to guess numbers which the audience had thought of, find hidden pins, disentangle himself from the most secure cabinet bonds after the manner of the Davenport Brothers, and emerge unassisted from a sealed sack. All these tricks he would fully explain and demonstrate on the last of the evenings. The Belgian Chronicle of the 8th reports that the first part of the programme succeeded admirably. "M. Bellini uses no aid but the hand of the spectator who has hidden or moved the objects, and holding it on his forehead, or manipulating it in a sort of fever, he went blindfold among the audience, finding various objects which, during his absence, had been hidden among their garments. Whatever may be the secret of M. Bellini's proceedings, the result which he obtains is surprising in the extreme." As to the second part of the entertainment, it was done cleverly enough, but—he never explained his tricks. "This is the wrong which he has done the public which he attracted to the hall by the promise of the explanation and solution of various experiences attributed to the intervention of spirits. Now M. Bellini gave neither solution nor explanation. Numbers of persons retired in great displeasure, considering themselves duped, et ma foi, ils n'avaient pas tort."

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

BIRMINGHAM (Oozells-street).—On Sunday, January the 18th, Miss R. Dale Owen gave an address morning and evening to the Birmingham Spiritualists. The subject in the morning was "Spirits as Mentors," and in the evening, "Where Spiritualism has led me." Mr. E. Tyndall took the chair at the morning meeting, and Mr. Turner in the evening. Miss Owen in speaking of spirits as mentors showed how she had been guided by them physically, mentally, and spiritually, and how her spirit guides have directed her in every detail of her life. The evening address was a continuation and sequel of the morning's, and gave a minute account of some of the truths her spirit guides had taught her. The whole discourse teemed with novel and important matter, and was a living comment on Christ's Sermon on the Mount. Miss Owen scarcely glanced at her scanty notes, and her style is simple, fluent, and clear, though the thoughts are often subtle. Her manner and language have a wonderful charm. Questions were asked and wisely answered by Miss Owen, and keen interest was excited. A drawing-room meeting was held in the Frederick-road, Edgbaston, at which Colonel Phelps presided, on the following Friday, when Miss Owen's address was again followed by an animated discussion. These meetings for the educated and wealthy are most important, for it is almost the only way in which they can be reached out of London. They will not attend the Sunday services or read the literature of Spiritualism; indeed, they have small chance of doing so as the libraries will not circulate its works.

GLASGOW.—The Glasgow Association of Spiritualists held a soiree and concert on the evening of Friday last, 23rd inst. ("Burns Night"), partly to commemorate the 126th anniversary of the poet's birth, and partly to aid the funds of the Society. It was the suggestion of an "anonymous friend," who generously offered to contribute the edible requisites and defray all incidental expenses, in order that the proceeds from the sale of tickets might go entirely to the benefit of the Society. The Hall, 2, Carlton-place, was unfortunately packed to discomfort, many late comers having to be catered for in an adjoining room. The entertainment, nevertheless, was hearty and joyous, the hall having been tastefully decorated with appropriate mottoes and snatches of song from the immortal repertoire of Burns. The programme was ample and varied, and the vocal efforts of the ladies and gentlemen who volunteered their services were, on the whole, successful. A dance followed, which was kept up with vigour by the younger members till an advanced hour in the morning. Mr. Wallis last week paid a visit to Dundee and held meetings there; and Mrs. Wallis was ministering a few days before to the spiritual necessities of inquirers in Aloo, a picturesque spot at the foot of the Ochills, in Clackmannanshire. Last Sunday the subject selected by the guides of Mr. Wallis was, "Man: His Nature and Needs." The treatment was able and exhaustive and evoked a considerable amount of applause. Miss Owen addresses the Society on Sunday and Monday, the 8th and 9th February. Mr. Morse has been engaged for 29th March.—ST. MUNG.

STONEHOUSE.—SAILORS' WELCOME.—On the evening of January 25th, at 7 p.m., the controls of Mr. W. Burt discoursed on "The Second Death" in their usual powerful and convincing manner, showing that the passages of Scripture—"Death and hell were cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death, and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever"—were to be understood only in their symbolical signification. Death: a life contrary to the will and laws of the Great Creator; Hell: the consequent reward, so to speak, of such a conduct of unholiness, bringing remorse of conscience and the sting of guilt. The lake of fire was the dark spheres, where a full expiation has to be made, and the last farthing has to be paid. The necessity of a life of holiness was urged upon all present, so as to attain to the first resurrection in which the second death shall have no power.—W.B.

EARLY DEATH.

"It is not the custom of the Germans to put on mourning for the young who die under twelve years of age."

'Tis well to mourn for infants lost,
And wear the sable signs of woe;
Yet still I prize the feeling most
Which deems that Death is not a foe
To those who early quit the world,
In sweetest innocence divine;
While yet the morning hours shine,
Nor gathering clouds obscure the sky,
'Tis happy then, 'tis good to die.

For then the young Immortal wakes,
So blithely on the shores of Life;
Of Life so real and so fair,
Where softly angels greeting bear
Their spotless charges to their bowers,
And tend with love their opening powers.

Oh, 'tis a bright prerogative,
No brighter lot the Heavens can give!
'Tis childhood's own ideal,
There poets' dreams are real;
There seek for youth's enchanted spring,
With mirth and play those sweet spheres ring.

Hence do the Germans, sage and deep,
Grief's trappings and the suits of woe
Not care to don, when infants sleep,
Not die, for swift to Heaven they go,
Where music strange, and scrapps' eyes,
Give joyous welcome to the skies.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S.; President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Pichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Pavre-Chavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HODGKIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBI, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Hodgkin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

In your last impression, "C. C. M." writes: "Mr. Gurney to my mind has hit a blot in the evidence, at least a defect, unless Dr. Wyld can further assure us. Was the ring which fell down after the séance, and which is available for examination, the same ring as was on the wrist?" To which question I reply, most certainly it was the same ring, for I picked it up, and on minute examination knew it to be my ring, and by the same marks as I knew the ring when on Husk's wrist to be my own ring. The ring on Mr. Husk's wrist was identical with the ring which fell to the ground.

These doubts as to my ability to know my own ring when I examine it, are to me, as "C. C. M." admits, "very absurd." All which is necessary to guarantee identity is secretly to fix on certain artificially produced marks, and also on certain marks in the manufacture of the ring, it may be as small as pin points and so situated towards other marks as to render recognition certain and imitation impossible, except to a microscopic engraver, who had expended, say, months of labour in an endeavour to produce a fac-simile.

Then as to a ring being intact anyone can determine that by ringing it, and as I have a broken ring in my possession, I can illustrate this test to anyone.

With reference to the absurd idea that Husk could in a few days produce a fac-simile of my ring, it should be mentioned that he is, and has been for years, so blind as to require a guide when he walks abroad or enters a house, and that he could not see any one of my private marks even if I pointed it out to him.

If then my ring is reproduced in fac-simile, Mr. Husk must employ not only a most skilful engraver, but also a most scientific forger in iron, who can calculate to the tenth of an inch the size of rings, and make due allowance for the expanding and contracting powers of heat and cold.

Here also it is important to remark, Mr. Husk has been for ten years exhibiting these ring tests, and he assures me that on an average he has probably produced three tests a week, that is 1,500 tests during the last ten years, and yet no one has ever published any account of any fraudulent production of rings.

I therefore assert most positively, that I know my own ring when I examine it, and that the production of a fac-simile by Mr. Husk or his friends in a few days is, to my mind, absurd and impossible.

I will now add additional evidence which I witnessed on the evening of the 29th inst., at the house of Mr. Stuart-Menteath.

Finding that my ring, although too small to pass over Mr. Husk's hand, could yet be passed, with some difficulty, over the hands of most young ladies on whom I experimented, I had an oval ring, No. 2, made, with diameters about $\frac{3}{8}$ in. less than ring No. 1, and this ring no young lady I presented it to could pass over her hand.

I sent this ring to Husk on, I think, the 26th inst., and on the 28th, at his own house, the ring was, according to evidence, placed intact on his wrist, while my friend, Mr. Bampfylde, held his hand.

I sat with Mr. Husk on the 29th, when he showed me my ring, No. 2, on his wrist. By the most minute examination, requiring the assistance of a magnifying glass, I was absolutely certain it was my own ring. Mr. Bampfylde, being present, said he had sat with Husk the night before, who said: "I have two of Dr. Wyld's rings in my coat pocket; perhaps 'Irresistible' will place one of them on my wrist." Mr. Bampfylde did not examine the medium's wrist for more than about one inch above the hand; and he did not see the rings said to be in Mr. Husk's pocket, and so far, his evidence is most imperfect; but, immediately after his superficial examination, he found the ring on the medium's arm,—he having held the medium's hand during the experiment.

The value of this test lies in the smallness of the ring, and I think I can safely assert that any man or woman of common sense would, after examination, affirm that such a ring could not possibly be forced over Mr. Husk's hand. I suspended the ring in situ by a bit of twine, and demonstrated to those present by its sound, when struck, that it was intact.

The only objection the sceptic can make to this experiment is that the ring might have been cut, then opened, and then again welded while on the wrist.

For myself, I have never seen or heard of any worker in iron who could weld an iron ring while on the wrist, said ring being separable from the wrist only about a quarter-of-an-inch. But if welding were possibly performed, then the appearance and form of the ring must have been altered, and if there were overlapping in the welding—and without overlapping no welding can take place—then the ring must have been reduced in circumference; but, on as minute a measurement as was possible under the circumstances, I found this was not the case. Moreover, any welding process must have obliterated certain marks in this ring.

I regret to add that "Irresistible," who, throughout the séance on the 29th seemed to be in rather feeble spirits, in harmony with the medium, who had a depressing cold, declared himself unable to remove my ring from the medium's wrist, and so I regret I have not got my ring at present to exhibit, but I shall doubtless have it in my possession in a few days.

I may now add that I have sent Mr. Husk two rings cut out of two kinds of solid hard wood, and two rings of equal size cut out of leather, in order to test "Irresistible's" ability to interlock them. So far as I know this has never been effected, although somewhat similar tests may be found recorded in Zöllner's "Transcendental Physics." It would almost seem to be necessary to these operations that the human magnetism of the operator should be continuous with the magnetism of the object, and in the case of two isolated rings this is not so.

It is most remarkable that, although Husk has been producing these ring tests for ten years, they have never evoked a systematic series of scientific experiments. No spiritualistic phenomenon is probably so far-reaching in its application, for if it can be proved that spiritual beings can dissolve and reconstruct material forms, such as iron rings, then as the greater difficulty contains the lesser difficulties all psycho-physical phenomena, such as the appearance of ghosts, and of solid materialised human forms, and of writing within closed slates, would admit of easy acceptance as manifestations of the dominance of spirit over matter.

DISORDERLY MANIFESTATIONS.

(FROM THE Revue Spirite, JANUARY 15TH.)

An esteemed correspondent vouches, after personal investigation, for the substantial accuracy of the facts contained in the following newspaper statement, which we quote from the Republicain de Seine-et-Marne :—

"Have you ever heard souls from purgatory? No! No more have we. But if you will go to Marles you may have that satisfaction, and without drawing upon your purse; for there, some half dozen—the precise number is not known—scapegraces from the other world come every evening and play pranks in the domicile of the curé, and then, having well exercised his patience, file off to the house of the good Sisters of Mercy, and there keep up their gambols.

"How fortunate for our commune in being, of all the communes of France, the one selected by a supra-terrestrial troupe for its first appearance! But our curé and the good Sisters do not so regard it.

"At the curé's the programme seems to be drumming and thumping on the kitchen saucepans, rattling with the tongs among the pots and crocks, knocking among household things in general, noisily opening and flapping umbrellas, &c.

"At the good Sisters' the troupe plays the most brilliant pieces of its répertoire by the aid of the house-bells, pipes of keys, and drumming on pots and pans, causing din enough to make a brave sapeur's skin creep.

"But after their concert comes their farce; they play at hoaxing like mad students. At the curé's they hide his boots, turn his garments inside out, put pepper in his snuff box. With the good Sisters, to their great alarm and distress, they play corresponding pranks.

"Now let us listen to what the worthy curé says about all this: 'What do these invisible, yet noisy spirits come to our presbytery for, and trouble the house of our good Sisters? What but to move our compassion for their unhappy and sorrowful lot, and to get masses said for their souls? Not having the power to speak, they call our attention by pleasantries such as these—pleasantries which they practise for their diversion in the ante-chambers of Satan, while awaiting a better time in the heavenly kingdom.'

We have to remark, says the Revue, that facts like these ought not to be left solely to the grotesque treatment of newspaper wits, nor to the clerical explanations of curés to their uninstructed flocks, but they should receive attention from our men of science. These might well take example from some of those of England, where a society has been formed for collating all facts showing occult agency, in the expectation that by their analysis a solution may be found for many problems now more and more occupying the attention of men of thought.

"M. A. (Oxon.)"—We regret to learn that "M. A. (Oxon.)" has had a relapse, which, however, has yielded, though slowly, to treatment. Necessarily, it has thrown him back, but the medical advisers think that time and care are now only needed to ensure a complete restoration to health.

THE "FOOLS, DOLTS, AND KNAVES."

It may interest non-Spiritualists to know the names of some to whom these terms have been applied by Mr. Labouchere in his paper. In writing as he did, he individually slandered and insulted every one who has borne testimony to psychical phenomena. We give a detailed list as recorded in these pages, of those who have publicly testified, during the past year only, to the genuineness of the phenomena occurring in Mr. Eglinton's presence alone. Many writers have abstained from giving their full names, and such have—with the exception of two persons—been eliminated from the list, as also have the names of every lady who has testified in like manner—not because they are not capable witnesses, but in order that Mr. Labouchere may not have the power to insult them personally, if so inclined.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—The attention of members and friends is requested to an announcement of the next Conversazione which appears in our advertisement columns.

TRANSITION OF MISS K. E. WOOD.—We regret to learn from a private letter that Miss Wood succumbed to an attack of typhoid fever at Adelaide early last month. We have no details, but probably the next mail will bring full particulars.

"TWO TWO WORLDS."—We are requested to announce that Mr. Eglinton's book can only be published by subscription. If those intending to order copies will do so at once, they will materially expedite the production of the work. All communications on the subject should be addressed to C. Manning, Esq., 11, Langham-street, W.

THE CHROMO PLATES.—We have received the following note from Mr. J. G. Keulemans :—"Will you kindly request your subscribers, on my behalf, to have patience until the last week of the month. The stones are done, but until I get my proofs it will be impossible to tell whether they are correct or not. Probably I shall have to use an additional tint-stone." Our readers may rest assured no unnecessary delay will occur. The gift will be a costly one—involving a cash expenditure on the part of Mr. Keulemans's co-donor of upwards of £30; while the former gentleman's labour and time would, in the open market, represent a similar amount.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"The Cry of the Hungry."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—What does Mr. Eubule-Evans want? As a member of the Psychical Research Society, I concur in his appreciation of its methods; but as there were brave men before Agamemnon, so there have been competent scientific investigators, some of them of great fame, who have verified some or other of these phenomena before the Society undertook the subject. On what ground will Mr. Eubule-Evans concede to one of its committees the credit which he withholds from witnesses quite as distinguished as any it is likely to supply him with? I can understand the man who says, "No testimony but that of my own particular senses will convince me," though I think his attitude irrational; but people who ask for testimony, and more testimony, and still let it all flow through their minds like water through a sieve, seem hopeless. "The Cry of the Hungry" is pathetic; but when food in any quantity and quality fails to nourish, it is a case for the hospital. There is at present an accumulation of good evidence for these phenomena generally, far exceeding that which existed for clairvoyance when Schopenhauer said, "Those who question it now are not to be called sceptical, but ignorant."

It has always seemed to me that the really needful work of the Society is less the verification of bare facts (though for the general public, which will not study existing evidence, that also is very useful), than the interpretation and co-ordination of them. We must hope, indeed, that facts of original research in the physical phenomena will be forthcoming to exercise the same high capabilities of observation, thought, and exposition, which have illustrated the subject of telepathy. But if Mr. Eubule-Evans has not already got his "little modicum of fact to start with," it is not because there is not on record plenty of the "scientific investigation" he desiderates. It would be impertinent to suggest of a gentleman of his intelligence that he is one of those by whom evidence is only respected until it is adduced—a very common case. But what else are we to say?

C. C. M.

Scientific Verification.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I see in this week's "LIGHT" that one of your correspondents suggests a committee from the Psychical Society as a jury suitable to decide on the genuineness of Mr. Eglinton's manifestations. I much fear that even were such a jury chosen from the Royal Society, if their verdict at all favoured Spiritualism, it would be set aside on the ground that they were incompetent. I well remember when Mr. Crookes, F.R.S., some years ago, commenced investigating the phenomena. The London Press was loud in the expression of satisfaction that a scientific man of Mr. Crookes' eminence had taken the matter in hand. But when his investigations resulted in a verdict of blessing and not of cursing, the Press suddenly changed their opinion of his scientific eminence, and pronounced him incompetent to form an opinion on the subject. The reason is obvious. It pays at present to denounce Spiritualism, and the Press is wise in its generation, not having forgotten the result of the Cornhill opening its pages to the subject. I think I can perceive in the extremely low and abusive language used by our opponents, a slight sign that they feel the ground not quite so secure as they have fondly imagined, and that they are doing all they can to ensnare Mr. Eglinton into an action at law, which course I sincerely trust he will not gratify them by adopting.—Yours obediently,

January 31st, 1885.

"Money Challenges."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

"Coelus alone against the whole of Tuscany."

SIR,—The reiterated censure passed upon me by yourself and some of my Spiritualist friends on account of the Labouchere challenge, passes my understanding. To hear my accusers, one would think that Spiritualists must not pretend to be and act like men of the world, but meekly to submit in dignified silence to any amount of pelting from the literary, journalistic, and scientific mob in the market-place. In fact, our pattern should be the Salvation Army. Against this I emphatically protest. Looking at Spiritualism as a science, though certainly the most sublime of them all put together, I think it behoves its adherents to defend it with the best weapons this world can supply; and if by the men of our time betting is considered the most effective, betting should be wielded to the confusion and defeat of its opponents. I can see no dishonour in this. It is really to be regretted that Mr. C. C. Massey, before condemning betting as unbecoming, did not see how engrained is that propensity in the Anglo-Saxon race. Indeed, no better example can be given of this than Mr. Massey himself. For whilst, at p. 52 of your last issue, he sharply rebukes me for having resorted to that indecorous practice, at p. 56, line 68, of the same issue, he, Mr. Massey himself, in a moment, no doubt, of unconscious cerebration, and in the very language of the betting ring, offers to lay 100 to 1 against Mr. Gurney. How truly said :—

"The faults of our neighbours with freedom we blame,
We tax not ourselves, though we practise the same."

Nay! behold Dr. Wyld, who, in the same number of "LIGHT," p. 55, unmindful of the sad fate of his friend Damiani, boldly offers to the said Mr. Gurney £20 to 1s. to prove the inimitability of his ring. May the gods avert a shower of thunderbolts from his head.

In the impatience of censure, my traducers have forgotten one or two things, and made one or two mistakes, which, with your permission, I will remind them of. To begin with, the bet did not originate with me but with Mr. Labouchere. Did my censurers ever reflect on the jeers, scoffs, and persiflage the Spiritualists would have had to endure in case Mr. Labouchere's heavy gauntlet had not been picked up? And would not our opponents and the watchful public cast for ever in our teeth this refusal of proof, to the great injury of our cause?

As it is, the defeat rests upon the head of the know-nothings, and true dignity with us. And does it not occur to the mind of your readers that, if at the time of the Slade affair, any Spiritualist had so demeaned himself as to challenge Lankester and Donkin as I have done Labouchere, it would have stopped the prosecution at once, and saved a blow to the cause and pain to an innocent man?

Again, Mr. Massey makes the mistake of believing me so deprived of tact as to state without knowledge that I pledged Mr. Eglinton's ministry without consulting him first. I did consult Mr. Eglinton, told him of my intention of accepting Mr. Labouchere's challenge, and obtained his promise to sit for the experiment of slate-writing. Nor does Mr. Massey seem to entertain a proper opinion of my experience in spiritual phenomena, when he hazards the opinion that I proposed to prove the reality of form manifestations by means of actual experiments with Mr. Eglinton, a thing which never entered my mind. And when he satirically alludes to the beautiful garments, his keen intelligence failed to perceive that I was addressing an ignorant public, and that I wished them to understand that the spirit forms presented themselves to us bedecked!

With respect to Mr. Barkas' assertion, "That the spiritual phenomena are not matters to be gambled about; but are facts for serious scientific examination," I would say that when the proceeds of a bet, wager, or lottery are destined for charity, it cannot be called gambling. And as to the scientific investigation, Mr. Barkas ought to know by this time that the men of science so-called would sooner be thrashed than investigate, and that nothing is left to us but to expose the obliqueness of their mind, by making them refuse to come to the test by a heavy challenge.

If the fault-finders only knew how many letters I have received in consequence of this despised challenge from persons high-placed in society, who have sought for interviews with me in order to know whether Spiritualism is true, so that they may change their materialistic views, they would make less noise.

Sir, my challenge has made the round of the world. It has met with the approval of the great majority of the Spiritualists. It has cowed our opponents, and has caused great desire for investigation. I am, therefore, proud of it; and, pitting my experience of mankind and of Spiritualism against any other Spiritualist living, I shall do the same again when I consider the occasion requires it.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,
29, Colville-road, Notting Hill, W. G. DAMIANI.

January 31st, 1885.

[We have also received a letter from "Trident," supporting Signor Damiani's course of action, but pressure on our Correspondence Columns compels us to omit it.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Money Challenges.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—I am one of those who, perhaps unfortunately, believe in the individuality of the spirit "operator at the other end of the line," and am frequently pained to see how persistently and consistently these spirit people are ignored, and their readiness to operate under any and all conditions taken for granted. I am inclined to think had Signor Damiani consulted "Ernest" before making his challenge, that it would not have been made, and surely, we who are Spiritualists should treat our spirit friends with common respect and courtesy at the least!

I have been delighted to read of the remarkable success attending Mr. Eglinton's mediumship, but not even his vigorous powers, I think, could stand the onslaught of opposing conditions and the positive thought-sphere of men like Messrs. Labouchere, Lankester, and Maskelyne and Cook. Experience in the past has, in many instances, demonstrated conclusively that where both spirits and mediums are willing and desirous that manifestations should occur, conditions, as presented by sceptical and critical sitters, have made success impossible. What chance would there be of winning the wager under the still more adverse conditions proposed, apart altogether from the immorality of the proposition?

It is not possible to force people to believe; there must be a growth within them, a desire for, and receptivity to, spiritual light; and as custodians of this important truth, we need rather more caution lest we "throw our pearls" where they will not be appreciated. A little pride is valuable here. If we cheapen the subject and fail to be conscious of its dignity and importance, we cannot complain if we are met with contempt, ridicule, and scorn.—Yours for truth,

FIDELEX.

Miracles.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In the Hon. Roden Noel's extremely interesting and valuable contribution to your columns of the 31st ult., this poet and philosopher indulges in some comments on miracles which I fancy are open to controversy. Your able contributor is of opinion that miracles in a vulgar sense do not happen, and that they are phenomena obedient to certain laws. Before we can arrive at positive conclusions on this knotty point, we must first define what we mean by miracle and law. I understand a miracle to be, not an unexplained wonder, but an actual superseding or violation of a known law of nature by the intervention of some superhuman intelligent being. A law I consider to be a certain result from a certain cause under certain conditions. Thus if this letter were conveyed to you a distance of some miles in a few minutes, the incident might be wonderful, but would not necessarily be miraculous. Investigation might prove that the letter was carried by a pigeon or sent through a pneumatic tube. In this case the fact would be governed by natural law. But if it were clearly shown that the letter was conveyed to you by my guardian angel or some other disembodied spirit, the incident would be, to all intents and purposes, a miracle, and nothing else. In one case the fact could always be repeated with unerring accuracy; in the other case it would depend upon the volition and intention of a superior being. That which depends upon the exercise of arbitrary power or caprice can scarcely be termed with propriety a matter of law. I must contend that the word miracle conveys to me an idea quite distinct from anything governed by law; and even if it should be argued that one thing obedient to law should be superseded by some transcendent potentiality also subservient to some higher law, then I should hold that this act of supersession was itself a miracle. A man who walked upon water by the assistance of angels, who held him up, would manifest or enact a miracle; and I do not think we could properly apply any other term to the incident.—Yours, &c.

TRIDENT.

A Correction.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As I was the only person who, in the Spiritualist, from November 23rd, 1877, under the nom de plume of "Scrutator," to March 28th, 1879, seriously took up the controversy against Madame Blavatsky, Colonel Olcott, and "C. C. M.," and only refrained on Madame Blavatsky calling me her "Nemesis," to which I alluded in the article of March 28th, 1879, saying, "It pains me to be regarded as a Nemesis; I would rather be looked upon as one who, like others, upholds principles in which he believes," I am rather sorry that my initials are given as W. R. P. in my article on the same subject, in your issue of January 3rd, since many of the old readers of the Spiritualist know who "Scrutator" was, and may not be sorry to know that he is still on this side the water.—Yours truly,

W. R. T.

Contradictions in Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—"Ebor's" difficulties, in my opinion, all arise from his want of a clear apprehension of the truth that man's faculties and perceptions while he is in this world are in an embryonic or rudimentary condition, requiring much development before he can be certain of anything, beyond the need of this development, which is his highest and deepest necessity. The acquirement of knowledge here is valuable, not for the exact information vainly expected of it, but rather for the development of the intellectual faculties which are its effect.

Let "Ebor" try and put himself in the position of a spirit teacher and he will soon find how difficult it is to convey the information as to facts for which "Ebor" craves. The difficulty arises from there being no point of mental perception in which they are agreed, owing to the undeveloped condition of the one and the developed condition of the other.

The pupil looks at all matter and phenomena around him, in this world, as wholly real; the spirit teacher from his higher standpoint perceives that although, interior to all things and motions of things, there is a vital reality, only a dim and imperfect shadow of this interior reality is perceived by us. Consequently the teacher is to his pupil in the position of a man who sees trying to describe a beautiful painting, full of noble colouring, to a man who was born blind.

"Ebor" says spirits do not vary in their morality. Well! how could they? Suppose a spirit came and said to him, "Go and murder that man, it is quite right to do so, because he is a bad man." "Ebor" would know at once this was an evil spirit. And if one came and gave him advice as to doing a good action, he would say that was a good spirit. And why? Because moral principle is a basic fact in the spirit of every human being incarnated or disincarnated, and is the basis of all his opinions as to his own character, or the character of others, here or in the spirit world. But, when we come to the so-called facts of existence here or there, it is very different, because the perceptive faculties we view them with are changing with each advance we make from sphere to sphere; and it would not be quite right for a spirit who had been even 1,000 years in the spirit world to say, "Such and such is the typography of the place in which I reside: because he is only himself in process of development to see things as they really are, and not as they seem. He might say, "So they appear to me now;" but he is well aware that he is liable to be contradicted by any spirit who is on a higher or lower plane of existence, whose perceptions necessarily differ from his.

I think, nevertheless, that "Ebor" is quite wrong in saying that we cannot use our reason in dealing with the conditions of spirit life. Notwithstanding the difficulties as to facts, caused by the growth of man's perceptions, we can still observe with more or less clearness the line of development which is in progress, and that is a gradual lessening of dependence on exterior impressions, with a substitution thereof of interior ones. We gradually perceive that the inner structure and foundation of all matter is thought, and therefore right thoughts and true morality are the only realities exterior to the inward spirit. Clad in thought robes, the spirit comes to our séances and by its power over the inner nature of things it gives to the reality that shadowy semblance called matter which is the only thing we can now see. What we call materialisation is not making a thing more visible and tangible, but doing the very reverse to the eye of a more developed, disincarnated spirit.

Regarding Spiritualism from this point of view, it is obvious that it teaches us that the paramount duty of man is the development of all his faculties, so that he may progress into a clearer apprehension of his duties to himself and his fellows. There can really be no evil in existence but want of development and progress. What are called the facts and phenomena of Modern Spiritualism are only of use to show to conscious and unconscious materialists, that the spirit here and hereafter is the real man, and that what they call matter is a phantasmal appearance suited to the condition of our present infantile perceptions. The conscious and professing materialists are easily known, but the unconscious ones are just the ordinary people in all walks of life, who would scout the idea of being so regarded. They form the majority of the people we meet at séances and who call themselves Spiritualists, but who from training and acquired habits have become quite unable to understand their own spiritual nature and its wants, which are infinitely more important to them than any knowledge that can possibly be acquired about the world of spirits, or the phenomena spirits can show us. It grieves all true Spiritualists deeply to see Spiritualism degraded by the perpetual parading of the feats of spirits in materialisation—passing matter through matter and such like—which are very minor phenomena in comparison with the magnificent revelations of truth which are to be heard from the lips of our trance speakers. One of these inspired speakers has just left London, who, in the opinion of many competent judges, is the finest trance speaker in the world. He was very badly supported when here by Spiritualists, mainly because his guides told the whole truth, concealing nothing. Had he lived 1,800 years ago, his words would have been idolised, and all who did not agree with them would have been denounced as heretics by the religious people of our day, who cannot understand that God, Human Nature and Inspiration are the same to-day as they were then. The educated Spiritualists in England are trying, for social reasons, to prevent any division between religion and Spiritualism; forgetting that if Spiritualism means Progress, and the religion of to-day means (as the secularist in a recent issue of "LIGHT" showed) Stagnation in beliefs or superstitions of a bygone age, the time must come when either there will be a stern conflict between the two, or the beliefs, doctrines, and teachings of the popular theology will have to be so radically reformed that little will remain of what is now esteemed most important.

The great work of protesting against the erroneous teachings of the popular theology is now left to secularists, but it is really our work. If our leaders do not like this work, others will no doubt be found to do it. Can Spiritualism ever be organised as long as there are people directing its very imperfect societies, who are not ashamed to own that they are converts (through observation of spiritual phenomena) to the popular theology, which is far more opposed in spirit to Spiritualism than Materialism or Secularism?

I am glad to say, however, that Spiritualism is to many thousands in this country, and to nearly all in America, the liberating force that has freed them from the mental and moral stagnation caused by adhesion to old beliefs; well enough suited for the age in which they were promulgated, but not so to the present age.

Let us uphold Spiritualism as the inner truth of all science; of all religion; and of all theology. It comes from the world of causation, and can be nothing less.

Spiritualism is now laying the foundation of a new and fuller dispensation of God's Truth than has ever been given to man before. If there are any among us who wish to bind it to old and imperfect beliefs, let us as true Spiritualists separate from them, and form ourselves into a solid phalanx of believers in the progress and development of truth and humanity. A Roman Catholic writes in a recent number of "LIGHT" that there is a quality he calls Grace required before progressive development can be begun. He forgot, however, to say (and I supply the omission) that God's grace is freely bestowed on all His children, whatever their beliefs may be; and no priest, pope, or clergyman, or other sacerdotal person or institution is necessary for its bestowal.

Masonry and the Occult Sciences.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I append a slip with extract from a curious letter which recently appeared in the Isle of Man Times. My object is to ask those of your readers who are Masons as well as Spiritualists to inform me, as far as they are able, what connection, if any, there is between Masonry and Psychical Science, either now or in the earlier days; also any information they may be able to afford me on the subject, either (with your permission) through these columns, or by a private letter addressed to your care.—Yours, &c.,

LUX.

"J. E. W.," if a Freemason, should know something of Theosophy. Christian Theosophy differs from Buddhist Theosophy as the day and night differ. If my brother has been initiated into the Mystic Temple of Freemasonry, he has trodden, in symbolic ritual, the path that a Christian Adept actually travels spiritually. I wish I dare speak publicly on the Freemason's Craft. Let me be understood. I respect the silence of Masonry, though by recent innovation a pack of rubbish has become grafted on the Masonic tree. Freemasonry was once a science, and its initiates were living evidences of the power of Christian Theosophy. Let my Masonic friends examine their ancient ritual spiritually, and they will find the key to most glorious knowledges—knowledges of the mystery of human life, of the cosmic laws; knowledges of the pathway of the Master Mason, the Arch Adept. It is claimed that Moses was a Freemason. Well, so he was, in the degree of his knowledge in the Theosophic laws flowing in the three-fold and seven-fold degrees, from the secret place where the living stone and fiery pillars are, and where the Arch Adept manifests His presence. In that knowledge He overcame the powers of the Egyptian Theosophic Adepts, who did not draw their power through the mystic rock and pillars. I dare not write more on this point. Let it suffice. There is a Christian Theosophy, and the Bible is its text-book. There is a Buddhist Theosophy, and its power is from the source of the Ungood. Carried beyond a certain point it is the Black Art. What wonderful power was displayed in opposition to the signs shown through Moses! Masons, have you lost the spirit of your craft? Has your hidden science become a pack of sentimental twaddle? Where are your adepts of the third degree, those who have passed the mystic veil, and are called Master Masons? Have you lost the secret of the Master Mason? Has the secret word become powerless? Do you, indeed, live in a world which has been visited by the Arch Adept, the Master of the Temple? Has the power of the Black Science penetrated into your holy place, and extinguished the Fire of the Sanctuary lamps? Shame, shame! It is even so. How pitiful to contemplate! Where is the purifying fire, breath of God, that used to flow from the sacred place? O, brother Masons, cleanse the lodge—sweep away every member who will not live in the spirit of the craft. Hark! there is a voice in the secret place, there is a sound of wings, all things indicate the Master's return, and the rock and the pillar will soon disclose their secret, trumpet-tongued on the air. Masons, every man to his place, the earth karma must be driven back. What if the Master comes and finds the Temple in disorder, littered over with the impurities of the enemy, where holiness should be written on every vessel and implement?

"Here is a subject for discussion. Let 'J. E. W.' tell what he knows of the Science of the Temple of Masonry, and in what way the Adepts of the Bible performed (in the Masonic science) their wonderful works.—Yours, &c.,

"A BIBLE STUDENT."

"P.S.—Take Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Daniel, Elijah, Elisha, and Jesus as examples. They were Master Masons, or Adepts, in the true Masonic or Theosophic Science, and performed their works in it."—Isle of Man Times.

DIFFUSE THE LIGHT.—"Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together": let us have our meetings in private and public, our home circles, our societies for research, our books by good writers, our well-sustained journals. The world is getting ready for us; it is a narrow, chilling selfishness alone which suggests the ceasing or releasing of our efforts to spread Spiritual truth. That is a wise old saying, "The gods help them who help themselves." The spirit-world does help us when we put forth our efforts in cultivating the higher. That it does help us, and is indeed in a great degree the inspiring source of what is best here, is well expressed in Lowell's golden words:—

"We see but half the causes of our deeds,
Seeking them only in the outer life,
And heedless of the encircling spirit-world;
Which, though unseen, is felt, as sows in us
All germs of pure and world-wide purposes."

MISS LULU HURST has been at Chicago. She was introduced at a special meeting of representatives of the Press, who formed as critical a company as could have been selected. Some of them said beforehand that they would be able to do anything in the way of strength that she did. But they found that they had made a miscalculation of their power. Some of our scientists, who do not condescend to investigate, say that her exhibition must be illusive, or that she must be aided by the unconscious muscular action of those who think they are resisting a supposed "force"! But when we see strong men flushed and panting with their futile efforts to prevent a strong chair from rising, on which Lulu Hurst only passively lays her hand; when we see a trained athlete struggle in vain to hold down an open umbrella upon her merely putting her hand in contact with it, it must be said that there is some "force" in nature of which our scientists have not yet given an account.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

"SPIRITS AND TRICKS."—A POPULAR ERROR EXPOSED.

The Whitehall Review has been discoursing on "Spirits and Tricks." It makes many a blunder, and perpetuates a grave popular suppressio veri, involving also, almost as a matter of course, a suggestio falsi. The whole article, however, is couched in terms at once courteous, and, from its own especial point of view, perfectly fair and just. We, therefore, gladly take up the gauntlet thrown down, fully believing that, as a matter of mere justice, our contemporary will correct the error into which he has been, no doubt, unwittingly led.

We say "unwittingly" because, reading between the lines, we observe evident traces of a desire to treat the question on its merits, though at the same time marks of "the trail of the serpent," in the shape of the lingering influence of a popular prejudice, are no less conspicuous. This article is, therefore, somewhat anomalous.

The pith of the remarks will be found in the following words:—

"We confess to siding entirely with Mr. Labouchere in his contest with the Spiritualists. He says they are conjurers; they say they are not. But they refuse to be tried by their peers. . . . The conjurer knows what great things can be done by trickery: if the spirits can beat these, then he must admit that they have other and stronger weapons than he has. . . . It may be a vulgar idea to associate the spirit marvels—if such there be—with ordinary conjuring; but why do not the Spiritualists get rid of this vulgar idea by challenging the conjurer? Let science follow. If a jury of professional conjurers fail to discover trickery, then let the scientific men investigate the matter. If conjurers fail to detect human agency at work, then there must be more in this Spiritualism than our philosophy dreams of. Let the matter be tackled in turns—first by the common conjurer, then by the learned men of science. If Spiritualism is the genuine thing which it professes to be, it can easily stand both tests. For this we know, on a high authority, that if these things be of God they will prosper, but if of man they will come to naught."

The issue is clear enough, and we accept the situation. The simple answer is that the conditions laid down have been fulfilled over and over again. Mediums do not refuse to be tested by conjurers. They have been so tested on many occasions. What they object to, and what any man with the slightest shred of self-respect would object to, is the intolerable insolence of the Laboucheres, Maskelynes and Cookes, and Ray Lankesters. Met fairly, as man to man, they shrink from no reasonable precaution desired by the investigator. But to be first called "knave," "cheat," "skunk," &c., and then expected to meet the originator of these offensive epithets, is rather more than ordinary human nature will tolerate.

No doubt the conjurer knows perfectly well, and better than the majority of people, the limits of the prestidigitator's art. We are agreed on that point. We, moreover, avow that if the testimony of conjurers is relevant to the case in point, then the Whitehall Review has not a leg to stand on. The conjurers have tested: the men of science have both followed and preceded the conjurer. The "vulgar idea," like all untruths, dies hard, but when the Whitehall Review is put in possession of the following facts it can hardly again plead ignorance if it perpetuates the "lie's long-lingering life."

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, as we have stated, more than once been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner as no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium. Houdin's testimony to the reality of psychical phenomena we published in extenso in our issue for January 24th; we now give the original testimony of the others named.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny. . . ."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

The Testimony of Hermann.

The Chicago Times (December, 1882) gives a long account of séances held by Hermann, the conjurer, with Mrs. Simpson, the psychographic medium of Chicago. We quote from a summary which appeared in this journal, omitting nothing, however, that is of importance:—

The sitting was held on December 2nd, at 10 a.m., at the rooms of Mrs. Simpson, the well known medium of Chicago. Mr. Hermann, and one of his assistants, Mr. J. H. McVicker, at whose theatre Hermann was then performing, and Professor Denslow were the observers. The Chicago Times, which has more than once shown its fairness in treating an unpopular subject, gives a long account of the proceedings, some parts of which are so important that we quote them in full.

The room in which the experiment was made was an ordinary one, containing a plain table 15in. by 22in., covered by a cloth, and placed near the window, through which the sun was shining. Hermann carefully examined the table, and testified that it was perfectly simple and plain.

Mrs. Simpson sat beside the table and handed Hermann her slate for examination. He pronounced it clean. Mrs. Simpson then asked Hermann's assistant to place his hand underneath hers, which supported the slate in a position directly against the under-surface of the table. He did so. The cloth was raised sufficiently for all the observers to see the slate resting firmly against the table, sustained by Mrs. Simpson's hand lying open and flat under it, and Hermann's assistant's hand again covering hers.

Mrs. Simpson requested Hermann to make some remark to which the psychographic message might form a reply, as this would be an additional precaution. He turned to McVicker, and said, "As I was saying—" The remainder of the remark was not audible. Instantly all heard the writing; Hermann acknowledged that it was clearly audible. Upon raising the cloth the hands and the slate were found undisturbed, and on the slate being examined it was found to contain the following words:—

"Yes, but I was not present when you made that remark." Hermann examined the writing carefully and said it was wonderful. "I am satisfied," said he, "let's go home." "Are you satisfied," inquired Professor Denslow, "that no living human person could have been in any contact with the pencil when it did the writing?" "Certainly I am," said Hermann; "how could any person get between the slate and the table? But I can do it inside of four days, and teach my assistant how to do it."

Mrs. Simpson here rose and tendered her chair smilingly to Hermann, begging him to take her place and perform the same trick then and there.

"No!" remarked Hermann waving away the proffered chair, "I can do it, but not now. I will do it at my own room in my hotel after breakfast. I have not had my breakfast, and have not the necessary force to do it here."

"If you do it," inquired Professor Denslow, "will you do it by the exercise of your art of legerdemain and deceit, or will you do it by the aid of forces not human?"

"She is not the only medium in the world. Other persons have the same powers as well as she. I tell you in a very few days I will do it all, and show my assistant how to do it," said Hermann.

"Is it a trick, as done here in the presence of Mrs. Simpson, in the sense that there is any deceit or imposition?" inquired Professor Denslow.

"No, none whatever. I agree with you fully on that point," replied Hermann.

"Will you certify that it is not done by the exercise of your art as a prestidigitator?" he was asked.

"No; not to-day. I will write a letter to Mr. McVicker about it from Pittsburgh, and if you publish that you get all you want," said Hermann.

"But you came here under an agreement to certify now what you have seen."

"Well, I will leave the paper at my hotel before leaving town this afternoon."

The writing above alluded to was obtained on Mrs. Simpson's own slate. To complete the test it is necessary to add that Hermann was requested to clean the slate which he had himself purchased and brought with him. This he did, and under circumstances precisely similar to those already detailed, an intelligent answer to a question proposed by McVicker, "Hermann, will you stay any longer than a week at Pittsburgh?" was at once received, "No! no longer than one week at Pittsburgh." The phenomena were thus reproduced with immediate success under conditions prescribed by Hermann, which he had confidently boasted would be fatal to results.

It will not fail to be noticed that Hermann admitted the genuineness of the phenomena, and, though he boasted of his power to reproduce it, he distinctly denied that such reproduction would be attributable to his skill as a conjurer. Maskelyne, in his controversy with "Iota," when he was offered £1,000 if he could perform and explain certain of the phenomena that occur in the presence of a medium, did the same. He admitted the genuineness of certain phenomena called spiritual. Hermann claims mediumship in so many words, and at a subsequent part of the sitting the intelligence present who wrote on the slate affirmed that he was a medium, but did not want to own it. Without attaching too much value to that claim, it is not a little singular that when confronted with these facts conjurers are powerless to produce them, save by claiming the mediumship which they set out by denying.

This is our case at present, as far as conjurers are concerned. We now, in conclusion, call upon the Whitehall Review as a bare act of justice to correct the mistaken impression it has, not knowing the facts, allowed to gain further currency through its columns.

JACQUES INAUDI.

It is agreeable to find, through your columns, that Jacques Inaudi, or Inode, the calculating boy from Coni, in Piedmont, is still to the fore. It was in the Revue Spirite of April and May, 1880, that he was first heard of by Spiritualists, and he was then ten years of age. Then, as now, it was suggested by the Revue that he may be a re-incarnation of some great mathematician. Though I admit this to be quite possible, I by no means take it for granted, for it has been asserted that he is a clairaudient medium.

In either case, however, one thing is necessary. The normal calculator and the calculating medium must both be phrenologically endowed with organs of the brain favourable for calculation, for the arithmetician in the flesh must have a well-formed brain for the mind to work on; and a good calculating control must find a good and appropriate medium, with a well constituted brain, for his tool. The American calculating boy, Zerah Colburn, had the organ of calculation very large, as Mr. L. N. Fowler, the phrenologist, informs us, and demonstrates by a portrait, while the Revue says of Jacques Inaudi: "He is said to have an enormous skull," and the Revue of April, 1880, gives a portrait of him from a photograph. There is, however, as I have hinted, an interesting fact concerning this boy, which is this: when he first became notorious for his calculating power he himself attributed it to mediumship, to the whisperings of his departed mother. So if he had been rich, and Dr. Winslow had got hold of him, he would have been shut up in a mad-house. But was it his mother? The child evidently thought so, and yet it need not have been so, for it might have been, and still may be, some control endowed strongly with this arithmetical faculty, who assumes that tender tie, the more to please the medium and to elicit his attention. At the same time, many Spiritualists will bear me out in the affirmation that they have themselves received the most touching, affectionate, and apparently reliable communications from invisible beings, purporting to be their mothers (Mr. Home being an eminent example)—communications which are about the last we could wish to cast aside as wanting in evidence of identity. Still, we must own that if in Jacques Inaudi's case his mother be indeed his control, it is but rarely we find mental arithmetic the especial forte of the female sex. And had she it during life?

A writer in the Revue of May, 1880, M. Bouillac, of Mère (Hérault) gives the following interesting anecdote of the child, who, at that time, used to go about to cafés and public places, where he demonstrated his powers. M. Bouillac had asked the boy to join himself and wife at breakfast, and while there, the boy remarked to a young woman who came in, "Would you like me to tell you how many minutes have passed since you were born?" The girl told him the year and the day of her birth. Jacques answered, "That makes twenty-two years, three months, and seventeen days." He then held down his head, and in twenty seconds he gave the numbers of minutes. I took a note and made the calculation; it was exact. I remarked that the child did not think, or seek it. He was simply very attentive—he listened. I said to him, "My little friend, it is not you who make these calculations." He looked me full in the face without answering. I repeated, "I know it is not you." And leaning towards him, and lowering my voice, I added, "I talk with the dead." He looked at me, and answered with a satisfied air, "Do you talk with the dead? You! Very well; yes, sir; it is not I, it is my mother, who is dead, who does all this for me, that I may get my bread." I asked him if he had told this to other people. He answered, "No," and said that no one had asked him; and, turning round, he cried, "Tenez! There is my mother; there she is!" "Ask her," I said, "if it pleases her to see you with us." But the spirit was gone. This poor child told me about his family, and much about his mother, whom his father beat, &c., &c.

W. R. T.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XV.

At Liverpool, some years ago, a violent mob smashed the cabinet of the Brothers Davenport into small bits. Now the Spiritualists of Liverpool fill a large hall every Sunday, and are about to build a larger one of their own, to be opened in due time with appropriate ceremonies.

Dr. Nichols' discourse on "Spiritualism—what it is," drew a good, though not a very large audience on Sunday morning, but every seat was filled in the evening to hear "What it does." The speaker held that proof of existence after death gives reasonable hope of immortality, and that when men know that they will live forever, they will live better. A life that may be ended any day by some trifling accident is one thing—a life that has eternal progress and endless happiness in its future is quite another. Spiritualism, uniting all men by the knowledge of a common destiny, must lead them to work together for the good of all. It is, in fact, the needed basis of a true society.

Why should a man trouble himself about the conditions of an existence which, as Materialism teaches, may end at any moment? Why not be friendly with those with whom we must live to all eternity? Only, if nine-tenths of the human race are to be eternally damned, why concern ourselves with improving the conditions of this momentary prelude to the horrors of the hereafter? Why should a Calvinist sit on the Royal Commission which takes evidence and talks about "Outcast London"?

Spiritualism gives the true basis to a brotherhood of humanity. The whole human race can unite when its common and glorious destiny is a demonstrated fact. The inequalities of human conditions, and even of development in this brief earth-life, disappear. Whatever good we do goes on forever.

Spiritualism gives to every one who opens his eyes to its facts a destiny, a career, and a dignity so far beyond our little political and social distinctions as to force upon us the sense of equality and the sentiment of fraternity. The aboriginal Australian did not mind being hanged because he felt sure that he should "jump up white man with plenty of sixpence."

With a little more experience—with that realisation of our mental and moral condition which time must bring to us—we Spiritualists shall be in a condition to infinitely improve the conditions of humanity. We need more science, perhaps; but our greatest need is the basis of all true action—the knowledge of our destiny.

"Know Thyself" is the motto for all reformers. To really know ourselves, our minds, our capabilities, we must know our destinies. All hope for human progress in this world rests upon the knowledge that our life is endless. Only with that knowledge can we truly know ourselves.

It is droll to see how Mr. Labouchere gets out of his challenge by first demanding a jury of scientists utterly committed to Materialism, and then a jury of conjurers, most of them being equally committed as "exposers." When a man is to be tried for murder they summon a dozen of the neighbouring shopkeepers, who, having no interest in the case, are supposed to be able to give a true verdict. But when, some years ago, women were hanged for shop-lifting, a jury of shopkeepers from Ludgate Hill was perilous.

Matter through matter. The facts are too numerous, and the observers too intelligent, to leave any doubt. Professor Zollner photographed the knots upon his endless cord, and the wooden ring he had turned, which, in the presence of the medium Slade, was placed upon the table pillar, contrary to "the well-known laws of nature." One of the most common of miracles in Mr. Eglinton's sésances has been the placing of a common chair upon the arm of a person who was firmly holding the medium's hand. If you doubt the soundness of the chair, examine it. If you doubt the continuous contact of the two hands, tie the wrists together with silk or cotton thread and hard knots. No one who fairly tries this experiment can fail to become convinced that "matter passes through matter."

There is no doubt that solid iron rings are placed upon, and taken from, Mr. Husk's arm, when his hand is held by others.

I, who write these words, have had a chair "threaded" upon my arm while holding Mr. Eglinton's hand—I have tied the wrists together with fine cotton thread. I have seen solid matter—visibly and palpably solid—form and dissolve. I have writing in ink, done between two slates firmly pressed together. I have writing in ink, done between the leaves of a large book as it lay upon a table in full light, with a heavy weight upon the cover.

And physical facts like these "are not worthy of the attention" of our men of science—our Huxleys, Tyndalls, Carpenters, Lankestons, Avellings, Proctors, &c. All the more honour to Wallace, Crookes, Zollner, and others, who have, like true philosophers, investigated facts even when utterly contrary to, and subversive of, "the well-known laws of nature."

A philosopher shutting his eyes to a visible, physical fact! "A trivial fact?" Well, Crookes' radiometer demonstrates the trivial fact of the force of light. A bit of paper dashing at a rubbed stick of sealing-wax is a trivial fact that shows the action of electricity. The trivial fact of a series of raps upon a table, or a bit of pencil writing between two slates, locked, wrapped, or tied together, may demonstrate spirit life and spirit power.

And this, our zealous Evangelical newspapers tell us, is the work, or amusement, of Satan—the fellow who persuaded Eve to eat the apple, which "brought death into the world and all our woe." Just so. Of course Satan is quite equal to it—but where is the motive? With all his machinery for filling the world with vice, crime, and misery—with the seven deadly sins in active operation, why bother himself with rapping on tables, and writing on slates, and making men believe that they will live after death? Our unbelieving and quite too credulous Evangelicals must try again. Satan has other work to do.

Two reporters of the Chicago Evening Journal have had a sésance with Henry Slade, of which they give a full report, an abstract of which I find in the Banner of Light. He held two slates, with a bit of pencil between them, in full light, to the ear of one reporter, and both heard the writing, even to the crossing of t's and the dotting of i's. Questions secretly written were answered. An accordion held by the valve end where no visible person could touch the keys, played several tunes, and the conclusion of the report is that: "They left with the unalterable conviction that, whatever interpretation or estimate was to be placed on Spiritualism, the manifestations which they witnessed were real and true, without the slightest admixture of fraud or chicanery."

Good for Chicago—but what is to hinder two reporters from the Times or Daily Telegraph, Standard, Daily News, Pall Mall Gazette, &c., making a similar visit to Mr. Eglinton? The Pall Mall Gazette has done some things truly heroic. It has even found some name for a rival journal besides the contemptible one of "contemporary." Why not distinguish itself by reporting one spiritual phenomenon?

TELEPATHY.—Some years ago a woodman and his wife lived near here, between whom there was such singular sympathy that they seemed to understand each other without speech even when not in presence of each other. In the winter of 1881, while the husband was out from home felling timber, the wife ran to a neighbour's for help, saying that she felt that her husband was dying; she did not know precisely where he was, but she instinctively went to the spot where they found him dead, from a wound by his axe, which had divided an artery. The wife became insane. If any one wishes to know all the details of this remarkable instance, I shall be happy to furnish them.—G. Russell, M.D., Calumet, Mich.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

At a meeting of L'Union Spirite Française, M. Delanne, editor of Le Spiritisme, quoted many proved instances of apport, the bringing of solid objects into closed rooms. In considering the phenomena, he divided them into two kinds. (1) Those where there was fluidic (spiritual) creation; and (2) those where there was only material apport, in which the penetrability of matter was manifested. He recalled experiments by Puysségur, and quoted those by modern magnetists, showing that objects have a fluidic double, or that they exist spiritually and materially. It is known that a body may take all forms—solid, liquid, gaseous, and radiant. He argued that a spirit might by will-power bring the matter of an object into the radiant state, and then re-solidify it upon its still existing fluidic double.—Le Spiritisme.

ON THE HIGHER ASPECTS OF THEOSOPHICAL STUDIES.—(Review.)

Perhaps no more competent exponent of the characteristic conceptions of Indian philosophy has appeared in this country than the accomplished young Brahmin gentleman at present the guest of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society. The paper before us deals with the moral problem of human life, its supreme aim, and the means of attainment. The first is defined to be Happiness; the second, Knowledge. Goodness has only relation to happiness; morality has no absolute worth. We state these propositions baldly, as if they contained nothing more or higher than Western nineteenth century utilitarianism, without the light thrown on them by a metaphysical psychology. To this latter refers the prime condition of attainment—Knowledge. But knowledge of what? The answer is, Of the changes of our conscious states, and of the relatively permanent underlying them. All existence is change; none of its states are everlasting. Now the great mistake we make is in thinking of our limited, personal self as an entity, essentially and radically distinct from all other such self, whereas it is in truth only a state of consciousness, and the ultimate basis of consciousness is universal. It does not follow from this that individuality is coincident with that particular state of external consciousness which is all we know of it at present, and which in this paper is called the personality. On the contrary, the personality is only a state of the individual self. This individuality we may provisionally call the human entity, remembering, however, that it is itself only a larger and deeper state of universal consciousness. We have, therefore, to apply this conception to the problem of happiness, and its ethical significance.

My ideal of happiness must relate to the most enduring state of consciousness which I can identify with myself. If "I" wish to be happy, the first thing, evidently, to ascertain is what "I" am, as far down as I can reach into my nature, that I may not identify myself with any very transient state or even mood. The self-indulgence which defeats its end even in this life arises from an extreme feebleness of imagination in the presence of desire, allowing the mood of the hour to stand for the self. Common experience corrects this mistake, which is more or less successfully opposed by the prudential or moral training received by most of us, without any disposition to extend the teaching. Nor can the teaching be extended without a power of self-identification with a state of consciousness lying deeper and comprising more than that partial state whose exclusive interests oppose it to other states, or personalities, on the same plane of consciousness. But this ideal, the true self we are in search of, and which may prescribe quite other conditions of happiness than those recognised by the personality as such, is not to be found at the end of any temporal series; it is either nothing, or it is, is now, the (relatively) real underlying the apparent. "In order to be truly happy the personality has to realise its own perpetual changefulness, and the result of such realisation will be the surrender of the desire for the permanence of any particular state of its existence, a desire springing simply from ignorance of its own nature. When this ignorance is dispelled, and the personality conforms itself to its nature to change, the character of the Ego is so completely altered as to render the personality, to all intents and purposes, extinct; to mark the difference of state, the entity is then called an individuality. It is not within the scope of this paper to discuss the nature of the existence of the individuality during the time when the personality lasts, or, strictly speaking, engages attention." By this last pregnant phrase, Mr. Mohini indicates the analogy to be pursued. Just as its momentary states of consciousness are to the personality itself, so is the latter to the individual Subject behind. Attention is engaged, as to particular acts, by interest or desire; and this may rise to a degree to make us oblivious for the time being of more important or lasting concerns. Now our whole personal life is, on a larger scale, just such an engagement or fixation of attention attaching an exaggerated value to its objects. So likewise, the power of disengaging the attention is in both cases the same in kind. The reflection which belongs to the personality comes to our aid to suppress the intensity with which a particular object attracts us. And our deeper subjective self evidences its existence by its power to represent in personal consciousness the mutability of all the states of the latter, and the consequent intrinsic worthlessness of its objects. If, as is only too likely, former attempts to elucidate the distinction between the personality and the individuality of man have resulted in little more than hazy impressions of a metaphysical puzzle, better success may be hoped from a method by which the one state is represented as merging and losing itself in the other, by the natural operation of consciousness in the course of its ethical self-realisation.

"Change alone is permanent. Forgetful of this, our personalities build up schemes of happiness in which the desire for the permanence of some particular state occupies a prominent position. . . . Examining the true nature of our consciousness, we find that the great cause of pain and suffering is the personality itself, or, in other words, the great interest we feel in ourself under the conviction of their separateness and opposition to other self. . . . As the work of ethical evolution proceeds, the personality which produces the consciousness of opposition of self and self, slackens its bonds and expands until it loses itself. The presence of opposition produces pain, which disappears in proportion as its true cause, the feeling of separateness, disappears; happiness grows with the growth of more permanent interests, and reaches its consummation when the 'dewdrop slips into the shining sea,' and the personality destroying its limitations merges in the all and loses its name. The peaks of perfection that the glorified individuality then begins to scale are far beyond the ken of mortal eyes. It never, indeed, loses 'the glory of going on and still to be.'"

Evolution and self-knowledge are thus essentially the same. We have not to become, but to know that we are. This leads us to the observation of another characteristic feature of Eastern thought in regard to spiritual attainment or evolution. This is the subordination of morality to knowledge. For the knowledge here meant—the knowledge of our own being—is not to be regarded as an intellectual possession which can be grasped by a metaphysical formula. It is an act of realisation by consciousness, involving in itself all the higher ethical results. Morality, on the other hand, belongs to some given stage of consciousness, as, perhaps, the highest, or as tending to become the highest, expression of that stage. Those higher moral ideals which do not require the sanction of a law, but appeal to a new or regenerate condition of the will, are not conceptions of an advanced standard of rectitude so much as presentiments of a larger consciousness, to the nascent development of which these ideals testify. Thus, for a morality controlling the lower nature, we have a higher nature becoming self-conscious. This certainly is not in itself a novel contribution of Eastern to Western thought. It is the Christian doctrine of Regeneration, referred to by St. Paul's distinction between the schoolmaster and Christ; as, again, it is the ideal which modern ethical speculation offers to the race, as a consequence of the hereditary transmission and progressive spontaneity of non-egoistic motives. But in Christianity the doctrine has remained a mystery, or a theological dogma, for all but the few who apprehend it really, if not explicitly, in the Eastern sense. The social ideal, on the other hand, has no metaphysical significance, since it recognises evolution only on one plane, being limited to a sort of moral two-dimensional world. The striking achievement of thought in the East is that its religion and its philosophy are one and the same system. And that is so because it does not regard the temporary limitation of consciousness—called in this paper the personality—as fully representing the subjective being, and as having, therefore, to be supplemented and converted by a power not essentially the self, however centrally that power may be conceived as operating. The supreme condition which every real religion demands, the denial of the personal self, is here to be taken quite literally; not as the "sacrifice" of something which exists, but as the discovery that what seems to be is not. To see limitation as being, as the essential self, is the illusion of personality. The principle of deliverance is, therefore, knowledge. Even speculative knowledge that our personality, i.e., the interest of consciousness in its objective relations, is a transient phase, will carry us a long way, if only we keep it always before us, winning by its means a continual equanimity and indifference to the action of external causes. For every application by will of abstract truth makes it an organic basis of life, realising or substantiating it in us, and is the progressive affirmation or recognition of the larger consciousness, whose true self-knowledge, transcending and dispelling the personality, is thus attained. The highest effectuation of Will is the subjugation of Desire, and Will is guided to this achievement by the knowledge that Desire does not belong to its true consciousness. It may seem, indeed, that such a negative knowledge cannot supply the content or state of the spiritual consciousness it affirms by contrast. But this is to overlook the positive side which necessarily belongs to the denial of personality. I cannot deny that my interests are other than yours without practically affirming all that we understand by fraternity and love. A consciousness without exclusive interests has total interests. It lives in the whole, and is the life of the whole, though it may be individualised by organic relations to an objective world, and by special functions. As long as the personality remains, individuality is for it metaphysical, while its own experience is physical. But there is only a shifting threshold between the two, for the metaphysical becomes the physical as soon as it is brought within the region of experience. "There dominates throughout the whole range of existence the eternal struggle of converting metaphysics into physics, and ethics is the power that fights. Any scheme of life that neglects one and enthrones the other of these will always defeat its own ends. Physics without metaphysics is empiricism; metaphysics without physics is dogmatism; and ethics by itself is superstition. The harmonious combination of these three elements forms what is called Theosophy, Wisdom-Religion, or Esoteric Science. The study of this great science is a proper development of all the different faculties, the synthetic unity of which is the man. Physics requires the cultivation of the intellect, metaphysics can be comprehended only by the development of the intuitive, or purely rational, faculties, while the emotional nature is expanded by ethics. The feeling of reverential awe for what we call spiritual is produced by the combination of the metaphysical and ethical faculties. Metaphysics recognises the true nature of consciousness, which ethics, acting through the emotions, forces us to realise. This impelling conviction produces the feeling of awe for the subjective side of nature, and makes it sacred." "The practicability of converting metaphysical concepts into physical facts by the help of ethics, must not be lost sight of." And this is "a task already accomplished by some individuals." Why not? If the philosophy of spiritual evolution be true, it is just what we should expect.

This view of the potential reduction of the metaphysical (transcendental) to what the writer here calls "Physics" (facts subject to scientific apprehension), is in agreement with much independent contemporary speculation. For the ontology of "things in themselves," behind the objective aspect of experience, is substituted the conception of an unreclaimed territory of experience. This is the balanced idealism which allows neither priority nor separate existence to either the subjective or the objective aspect. All existence is consciousness ("the universe," says Mr. Mohini, "is a grand consciousness"); and what for us is the transcendental, unknown and unseen, is only a field of experience in which the subjective conditions are different from ours. One of our own most distinguished metaphysicians, Mr. Shadworth Hodgson, in his "Philosophy of Reflection," and Dr. du Prel, in his "Philosophie der Mystik," have arrived at very similar results.

Another characteristic of Eastern thought, to which also the generalisations of Western philosophy are independently tending, is its fidelity to the analogies of nature. That is very observable in the view of death as the termination of an objective phase of human existence, and its retreat into a subjective one. Alternation of opposites is one of the most universal facts of nature. Action and re-action, activity and rest, expiration and inspiration, whether we take our examples from mechanics or from organic phenomena, we find the same law measuring time by opposite states. Nothing but our inability to grasp existence and its changes on a large scale has prevented the otherwise obvious application to the case of man. For by another law, of which philosophy and science may perhaps make greater use hereafter, with everything that which happens on the small scale represents and repeats the larger area or cycle of its existence. It is, indeed, very possible to misinterpret this law, as is, perhaps, especially the case in seeking the true correspondence of waking and sleeping with life and death. According to the apparent analogy, for instance, the subjective state to which it is said death introduces us, and which answers to the diurnal sleep, should have a duration of only one-third of the objective life, instead of being enormously in excess of it. The solution, we suspect, is to be found in the different measures of time. This might happen in either of two ways, supposing what we learn of the hundreds, or even thousands of "years" of the Devachanic consciousness to be, in some sense, true.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

The measure of time may be taken from either the subjective or the objective state, and the two measures may not at all coincide. And that would be quite in accordance with dream experience. But our present object is only to point out the presumption from general analogy in favour of the statement that survival after death does not mean a mere continuity of the personal life under new objective conditions, but in the withdrawal into an interior state of consciousness. The consciousness of personal identity would then depend upon how far the interior consciousness had already been associated with the personal life; for without association of ideas there is no recollection. The intermediate state, or "Kama-loca," answers to the period during which the still harassed, or interested, mind is kept awake, or half awake, by dwelling on the occupations, excitements, or hopes of the past day, a period which in the one case as in the other, will be extremely variable. It appears to be now quite conceded that communication with the half-awake personalities in Kama-loca through mediums is possible and a fact. But the analogy enables us easily to appreciate the objection urged against these practices. When we have parted with the organism by which we energised in collateral reciprocity with others on the same plane, continuance on that plane can only be a morbid endeavour of consciousness to maintain its objective phase. The true individuality would return into itself, into its larger life. This disengagement may be seriously retarded by importunity. The would-be sleeper after his toil may be kept feverishly and uselessly awake by care or anxiety, but who would be so barbarous as to molest his repose by insisting on conversation with him? Even his willingness, if he be willing, is not, in his interests, to be encouraged.

But though little good is to be got, and much evil is to be apprehended, from these communications with Kama-loca, we learn that the rest of Devachan is a period of spiritual effluence. It is a proposition strongly insisted upon that all true spiritual communication must be subjective. That means from consciousness on a higher plane en rapport with our own similar intuitive consciousness, whereas Kama-loca being only an obscure continuation of the earth-life, communication thence can only be of an external character. Mr. Mohini thinks it is a fact "that men dying at a ripe old age with the satisfaction of having accomplished all life's labours, very rarely manifest through mediums." But "those alone who, during a long course of unselfish life, have shed every atom of material craving, are able to overleap Kama-loca altogether, while, in the case of the generality, its duration varies from some hours to a great many years." But all such statements about duration should, we think, be taken with the understanding that time has no absolute measure, and that therefore estimates taken from our measure give us little real information.

This review must close with a citation concerning Devachan, for we have left no space for a criticism, which would necessarily be of a metaphysical character, of the further statement that entities in that state are not self-conscious.

"While the spiritual life of an individual is unfolding itself in Devachan, sympathetic souls on earth feel the vivifying and spiritualising influence of that unfoldment, and translate it into their physical lives according to their respective spiritual development. Whenever an individual on earth is enabled, by his highly spiritual life, to live upon the plane of soul, he can consciously receive the influx of spiritual energy thus showered upon the earth, and trace it to its source. True spiritual communication must be of a subjective character. The pure spiritual being, even while on earth, vibrates in unison with some glorified predecessors, a good man in life and goodness in death. It will thus be seen that good men, freed from the limitations of the flesh, become inspiring influences in their turn, and so remain for a period immeasurably greater than the span of their lives on earth, before making another descent into objective life."

Le Spiritisme gives a list of eighteen circles (groupes) now being held in Paris, with their addresses and times of meeting.

The Figaro of Paris has an article upon the dramatist, Victorien Sardou, which says that through his hand, as a medium, wonderful drawings, filled with fine detail, have been executed; while it is well-known that he cannot, in his ordinary state, make the simplest sketch. Further proof that the public mind is turning more in the direction of Spiritualism is furnished by the fact that Figaro is also printing a serial tale, "Histoire à faire peur," based upon spiritual facts and presentiments.—Le Spiritisme.

GLASGOW.—Last Sunday, while the usual services were being conducted in the Spiritualists' meeting-place, Miss Rosamond Dale Owen lectured to the Secularists in their Hall, Ingram-street. Miss Owen spoke twice, forenoon and evening, her subjects being respectively, "A Chat about Robert Owen," and "Work." Her morning audience was somewhat scanty and scattered, but the lecture was delivered with an easy grace, and contained many interesting points. The audience in the evening was large, and the address was in many respects much more telling in its deliverance and effect. Miss Owen is not only an ardent, but also a true and consistent, Spiritualist. She fully realises the vital importance of the conviction which possesses her, and courageously seizes every opportunity that presents itself for making obvious to others the realities and significance of Spiritualism. It may, therefore, be inferred that, on the occasion in question, she was not reticent respecting the theme which lies nearest her heart. Dealing with the subject of "work" in relation to the spiritual in man, Miss Owen had probably the advantage of her audience in possessing a clear knowledge of certain spiritual laws and forces which, although constantly operative in the various spheres of human life and its relationship, are yet undreamt of in the philosophy of the average Secularist. In expounding such laws, therefore, by means of simple and obvious illustrations, clearly presented, Miss Owen was able to utter the essence of Spiritualism from the Secular platform. Doubtless many were affected only by the "strange doctrines"; others, let us hope, gathered a few seed-grains of truth that possibly may quicken by-and-by and grow into new forms of thought in their minds. However this may be, the spectacle of a fragile woman addressing an audience of hard-headed thinkers, accustomed mostly to the utterances of religious iconoclasts, addressing them, too, in a way which at times was totally opposed to the bent of their minds, and throughout maintaining a manner serenely composed, a style of utterance simple, fluent, and unconsciously graceful, was of itself something to ponder over. In the Hall, 2, Carlton-place, Mr. Wallis occupied the platform in the evening, and his guides replied to written questions submitted by the audience. The attendance was large, and the questions were numerous and varied. The replies by the guides were remarkable for their eloquence and fulness. Mr. Wallis was evidently in his best form, and gave forth his inspirations with ease, freshness, and freedom. Miss Owen will speak next Sunday, her subject being, "Where Spiritualism has led me"; also on the Monday following, at 8 p.m., on "Experimental Proof of a Hereafter."—ST. MUNG.

NEWCASTLE.—On January 20th the members of this Society held their annual meeting, when the usual report of the Society's work was read and adopted, and the election of an executive made for the ensuing year. The new rule, prohibiting an officer from holding the same office more than two years in succession came in force for the first time, and caused a change in the presidency, the vice-presidents, and one of the secretaries, the new president being Mr. Thomas Thomson, and the vice-presidents Messrs. Kersey and Kay; Mr. C. E. Gillespie, of 25, Jefferson-street, retained the office of corresponding secretary; the only other change being two fresh faces amongst the committee. The treasurer's report showed a balance, in favour of the treasurer, of £15 7s. 6d.; this was considered favourable, considering the work done and the extra expenditure which had been necessarily involved. On the 26th and 27th the ladies of the Society held a sale of work to raise funds to help the N.S.E.S. to promote the cause more efficiently. The result was most satisfactory, about £29 being cleared. The hall was nicely decorated, the stalls well filled and patronised, and everything disposed of, excepting a pair of pictures, the time being agreeably diversified with some vocal and instrumental music by the kindness of a few friends.—LINDISFARNE.

A "LITTLE ONE" writing in reference to Dr. Ray Lankester's attack on Mr. Eglinton, says: "My son and self had a séance with Mr. Eglinton a fortnight ago, and although I did not succeed in my object, which was to be put into communication, if possible, with one particular spirit, and, moreover, was dissatisfied with the explanation of difficulties given by the 'Guide,' Ernest, yet I am as firmly convinced as I can be of anything, that the long message (written in an incredibly short space of time) which I received was produced by an intelligence other than that of the medium. Mr. Eglinton no more wrote it than that sage Professor Lankester himself. What we want in investigating these strange phenomena is a trifle less cleverness and a disposition to believe that after all there may be one or two members of the human race, not, of course, as wise as ourselves, but as honest."

originally described by Mr. Theobald, in "LIGHT" of April 19th and May 3rd, was due, not to the actual method of production of the writing—for the conditions were not such as to exclude possible fraud—but to the antecedent improbability that any person capable of such fraud should have any knowledge of the works of old and little-known Persian poets, and should be able to give accurate translations from their works, and an accurate account of the life of one of them. The whole interest of the matter lies, and must have been understood by all readers of "LIGHT" to lie, in this admitted improbability. When, therefore, Mr. Theobald discovered—what he did discover in the interval between the original publication of these writings and their republication in "LIGHT" of June 14th—that the whole of the information given was derived from such a readily accessible source as "Chambers' Repository," it was clearly incumbent on him to explain this in the most unmistakable terms to his readers. What he does say in the note referred to I will here quote.

"Since writing the above, I have had my attention called to an old tract, called 'Persian Poetry,' published by Chambers many years ago, in which every particular relating to Wamik is confirmed. . . . Wamik here unfolds the mystic doctrines of Zerdusht, and has several stanzas on the world of fire, in the midst of which come the two which he wrote direct in our midst; but in the tract the last line but two differs, and reads thus: 'Thy living word through Vesta's fire domain,' and in a note we are told that the word in italics is introduced by the translator. The spirit of Wamik, in writing it now, uses Zend Avesta, and otherwise corrects the translator. The slight variations, as a test of spirit identity, are important and interesting. . . . In the same tract are also very interesting references to Saadi, and some of the poems written by the spirit of Saadi, as quoted above, are given with similar variations, which preclude the idea of their being copies, if such were admitted possible."

This parsimonious commentary can hardly be considered a satisfactory account of the matter. The "old tract" referred to is included in Part VI. of that at one time popular and widely-circulated series known as "Chambers' Repository of Instructive and Amusing Tracts." It is, therefore, as stated above, a readily accessible source of information. From this source are derived all (not "some," as stated by Mr. Theobald) the translations of Persian poetry quoted in Mr. Theobald's articles; and all the biographical details given. The poetry is quoted verbatim et literatim, except for a few trifling alterations, which invariably violate the rhythm, and very generally the sense and the grammar. For instance, in the passage beginning "At home the point of junction is the hearth" ("LIGHT" of June 14th, pp. 248, 249), in the tract the last line but two reads "Thy living word through Vesta's fire-domain," but Mr. Theobald's version has it, "Thy Zend Avesta, thy living fire domain." This line which, of course, does not scan, and the sense of which is doubtful—is an incongruous mosaic of the original line and of two footnotes given in the tract. The first note is appended to "thy Living Word," explaining that it alludes to the "Zend Avesta"; the second note—referred to by Mr. Theobald—states that the word "Vesta" was introduced by the translator. The "spirit of Wamik," Mr. Theobald tells us, signs this production, and adds the interesting information, "Wamik was burnt to death at Abyssinia: he lived in this life before 636" ("LIGHT," p. 249). The spirit's zeal for biographical accuracy has here outstripped his discretion. If either the spirit or Mr. Theobald had read the tract in "Chambers' Repository" with sufficient care they would have discovered that "Wamik" never lived at all; he is an allegorical and wholly imaginary personage, the hero, not the author, of the poem quoted; and that the date 636, given in the tract, has no connection whatever either with "Wamik" or the unknown poet. In view of these facts Mr. Theobald must, I think, admit that the proof of "spirit identity" cannot as yet be considered complete. It is hardly necessary to detail other variations in the poems as given by the spirits, and as printed in the "Repository"; they are all of the same clumsy type.

There is one interesting point, however, to be noted about the poem headed Ghazal ("LIGHT," p. 247), which appears in the "Repository" as Ghazal (apparently a name for a short lyrical poem). The spirit of Saadi, I regret to say, claims this poem as his own; it is in reality a combination of two poems by a later author—one of the Sufis.

Again, Mr. Theobald hardly does justice to his subject when, in the last lines of the note referred to, he says that the tract contains "very interesting references to Saadi." The reader would certainly not suppose from this casual remark that the whole account which the spirit of Saadi gives of his life on earth is borrowed almost word for word from the tract. Readers of "LIGHT" must, I imagine, have grown tolerably familiar in the last few months with the citation of parallel passages from English and Oriental literature, and I will spare them another infliction of the kind. But it should be observed that the sage whose writings formed the basis of a previous comparison had more excuse for his borrowing, and showed more discretion and accuracy in the manner of it. For our poet, in describing facts so familiar to him as the events of his own past life, is content to use the precise words of another, adding to them not at all, and omitting only certain facts somewhat discreditable to himself. I am afraid we must allow that here, too, we require some further proof before we can regard the identity of the communicating spirit as established. Mr. Theobald, however, is not, apparently, of this opinion. In "LIGHT" of April 19th, after giving Saadi's own account of himself, he writes:—

"On receiving this history I thought it possessed incidents sufficient, probably, for testing its accuracy, and sent notes of it on to my friend, 'M. A. (Oxon.)' from whom I received the following extract, which substantially confirms this spirit identity."

The extract referred to is an account of Saadi derived from another source, corresponding in detail with that given Mr. Theobald by that "spirit." It is difficult to understand upon what rules of evidence Mr. Theobald proceeds when he speaks of the correspondence as a substantial confirmation of spirit identity, even when the source of the spirit communication was still unknown. But a few weeks after publishing this, it was pointed out to him that Saadi's account of himself was undoubtedly derived from the tract above-mentioned, and that this correspondence of two independent accounts of his life was, therefore, destitute of what little evidential significance it might have been supposed to possess. What are we to think of his competency as a witness, and of the value of his recorded evidence, when we find that in republishing the account twice ("LIGHT," June 14th, and "Spiritualism at Home") he does not mention these circumstances at all, and alludes to the tract in question merely as containing "very interesting references to Saadi"!!!

In a subsequent letter I hope to return to the subject of these writings from another point of view.

ORGANISATION.—Believers in Spiritualism are more numerous than any sect in Christendom, excepting the Roman Catholics; yet the most insignificant among them can bring a strong influence to bear upon society, because they, one and all, recognise the value of organisation. Misrepresentations of us, of our principles, and of our people are continually admonishing us to organise. Will any apostle of disorganisation enlighten us as to the superiority of leaving everything among us at loose-ends? If Spiritualism is not respected the fault lies at our own doors. It should appeal to all, for it has in it all the elements for engaging our best affections and for exercising our best intellects. Organise Spiritualism on a natural, broad, rational basis, and it will command the respect of the world. —Dr. S. B. Brittan (1878).

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

My fourth séance with Husk was again, by the kindness of Mr. Stuart-Menteath, held at his house on the 5th inst.

We had ring No. 1, which we found too small to be forced over Husk's hand, again placed on his wrist; but as this operation was not under test conditions, I cannot assert that it was placed there after Captain James had hold of the medium's hand.

My object in now addressing you is to draw attention to the present condition of the case.

Husk has my ring, No. 2, still on his wrist, namely, nine days after it was first placed there; he telling us that "Irresistible" declares he will not remove it for some time, as he wishes his medium to exhibit it as an evidence of matter through matter; and to favour this object I now give Mr. Husk's address: 60, Maxted-road, Peckham Rye.

As to the possibility of this ring, which is manifestly much too small to be forced over Husk's hand, having been cut open and then welded on Husk's wrist, I to-day took the opinion of two friends who are civil engineers, one of whose specialities is connected with details in iron, in reference to the construction of locomotive engines. Their opinion was:—

1. In order to weld such a ring, a white heat, approaching the melting point, would be required, and this would almost exclude the attempt to weld it on a human wrist.

2. This necessary degree of heat could not be retained by so slender a ring for more than about one-third of a minute, a period much too brief in which to re-bend the ring into its circular shape round the wrist and to complete the welding.

3. Such an operation, if possible, could be effected by means of a pair of pincers made for the occasion, of a special curve, calibre, and shape, and would require a great leverage power; but such power could only be used through an instrument too large and clumsy to grasp a fine ring within a quarter inch of the wrist.

4. The operation, if effected, would leave the line of welding visible, and thus reveal the operation, although the ring need not be reduced in circumference by the welding, as I have formerly stated, as the ends could be drawn out.

I think we may, therefore, exclude the idea of Husk having had ring No. 2 welded on his wrist. At the same time, it is easier to believe in such a welding than in the passage of matter through matter.

I trust I do not weary your readers with these repeated tests and details, and they will at least show that I am determined not to accept so astounding a proposition as the passage of matter through matter on trust.

Criticisms on this matter are very important as they lead to renewed and more careful experiments. But those who criticise this subject should have certain mechanical aptitudes, and first of all should most carefully examine the experimenter and the materials operated on, before verbally and publicly criticising the operations themselves.

7th February.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

MR. PLUMB, a leading citizen of Sreator, Illinois, writes to us:—"Dr. Slade has been here for a week; about fifty inquirers had séances, and were much impressed by the facts witnessed through his mediumship. His visit has given the cause a great impetus here."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

LET those who believe in a resurrection of the material body consider attentively this passage of St. Paul, "But this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Is not this contrary to the interpretation that the material body will rise again? What we bury is not a human being; it is only its outer used-up framework, which becomes decomposed into its elements, to go to the building up of other material organisms. The doctrine of Jesus is that the soul is the man, that death is the parting of it from its temporary earthly apparatus. The resurrection is only of spiritual significance.—Dr. Wilder.

PROFESSOR ELLIOTT COUES' EXPLANATION OF TELEPATHY.

(From The Nation.)

I beg to offer some hypotheses in explanation of telepathy:

(a.) Suppose that the fact of telepathy has been established substantially according to the results reached by the London Society for Psychical Research, viz.: that one person can know what another person is thinking of without any known physical means of communication;

(b.) Suppose that consciousness and memory, will, understanding, &c., do not depend upon matter for their existence, but only for their manifestation; i.e., are spiritually self-existent, but require a physical basis whence to effect any knowable result, i.e., to become efficient causes or "forces";

(c.) Suppose there is an ubiquitous, imponderable, frictionless, tonic (i.e., not atomic) or any other state of matter, ordinarily inappreciable to the physical senses, having modes of motion peculiar to itself and appropriate to the support and primary manifestation of consciousness; and that we agree to call this kind of matter "akasa," or "od," or "biogen," or anything else;

(d.) Suppose akasa susceptible of being set in sundry modes of motion by the consciousness, will, &c., of some person, and that such modes of motion are respectively the expression of such and such thoughts, in the form of thought-waves;

(e.) Suppose biogen capable of continuing for some time a particular mode of motion impressed upon it by the will, and of propagating this motion to some distance from the point of its origination, just as light-waves, &c., are propagated—both the matter and its motion being ordinarily imperceptible to the physical senses;

(f.) Suppose a person at some distance to be affected by the impacts of these waves in a way that causes in him waves identical in all respects with those proceeding from the originator of the motion;

Obviously, then, the consciousness of the two individuals would coincide; i.e., one would have come to think the same thing the other thought; i.e., one would have "read the mind" of the other; and the operation of the one mind upon the other would not have been cognised by the physical senses of anybody; i.e., it would have been the action of one mind upon another at a distance, without any known physical means of communication; i.e., it would constitute telepathy—just what the London Society for Psychic Research would appear to have established.

Assuming the truth of this hypothesis, it accounts for the facts, is not incompatible with any of them, and is, therefore, an available working hypothesis to explain telepathy.

The biogen-theory derives some confirmation from the fact (not generally known or accepted, and contrary to some of what are called "laws of matter"), that some persons, in certain states of mind, can see the biogen-waves proceed in a ray or pencil from the agent and impinge upon the object.

It derives additional confirmation from the fact, that biogen, in some of its states and modes of motions, may be smelt, heard, seen, and handled by any one; i.e., comes under the ordinary observation of the physical senses.

It may relieve the minds of some to be assured that no Deus ex machina need be invoked to lay some of the "ghosts" that haunt the séances of the Spiritualists. I have nothing to say here of those alleged ghosts supposed to be apparitions of dead persons. But I will give a new name to what are called "veridical phantoms." I will call them telepathic automata. With this hint, and the reminder that the substance which composes the visible and tangible bodies of telepathic automata is that which I have elsewhere described and named biogen,—I remain very truly yours,

ELLIOTT COUES,

1726 N. St. Washington St., Dec. 28th, 1884.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—To make a reply which shall be no answer, and to divert attention from the main question by importing a slight flavour of personality into a discussion—these are controversial devices with which the world has long been familiar, and of which the letter of "C.C.M." affords yet another example. Any little amusement which may be derived from them has been, I am sure, abundantly earned by such of the readers of "LIGHT" as have ever made an honest attempt to study the metaphysics so often set before them by the same writer.

"What does Mr. Eubule-Evans want?" asks "C.C.M." Well, incredible as it may appear, Mr. Eubule-Evans actually wants a plain answer to a plain question. But he no longer expects to get it. For what would become of the occult under these circumstances? How could such a tender creeper flourish in the bracing atmosphere of categorical clearness?

My question was and is: "Why does not the Society for Psychical Research investigate the most prominent psychical phenomenon of the day? Has the Society a reason for not offering to do so, or does Mr. Eglinton decline to be investigated by the Society?" These are questions which obviously admit of categorical answers. If they do not receive them, even that congeries of noodles, "the general public," which, according to "C.C.M.," "will not study existing evidence," will yet be able, without over-pressure on its faculties, to draw a right conclusion here.

Of course no one with any knowledge of human nature expects strict logic from an avowed partisan; but it is, perhaps, a little less ad rem than usual for "C.C.M." to inform us that, in his opinion, the proper work of the Society for Psychical Research is "less the verification of bare facts than the interpretation and co-ordination of them." The question here is, not "C.C.M.'s" opinion as to what the Society ought to do, but what the Society itself professes as its aim and object, and as yet, it has happily shown no tendency to devote itself to the co-ordination of "facts" which it has taken no pains to verify. No doubt, were it to do so, some magnificent generalisations would be the result. Sitting in Lama-like seclusion in Dean's-yard, and abundantly fed in the darkness with occult phenomena by "C.C.M." and Mr. Morell Theobald (phenomenal Greek preferred), it would astound, if not convince, the world by the grandeur of its co-ordinating faculty. And in the end, like the Lama, it would assuredly receive the reward of a well deserved apothecosis a little hurriedly achieved.

Meanwhile, so long as my question remains unanswered, I am assured of the continued existence of at least one occult phenomenon.—Yours faithfully,
New Athenæum Club, S.W. A. EUBULE-EVANS.

[The "plain answer" required by Mr. Evans can obviously only be given by either of the parties concerned. Speaking unofficially, we believe we are within the mark in saying that neither the Society nor the medium fight shy one of the other. The former have hitherto confined their official investigation to another phase of occult phenomena. We believe, however, that individual members of the various committees have obtained very satisfactory results with Mr. Eglinton. We also believe the time is near at hand when the Society for Psychical Research, as a result of its investigations, will be compelled to make some distinct statement as regards "Spiritualism." We trust that the public will have been sufficiently educated by its researches and influence to receive their report in a different manner to that in which previous reports have been received.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]

Money Challenges.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In the letter you publish from Signor Damiani on the above subject, he says: "It is really to be regretted that Mr. C. C. Massey, before condemning betting as unbecoming, did not see," &c.

To which I reply, that it is really to be regretted that Signor Damiani, before attributing to me a moral objection which I never dreamed of raising, had not taken the trouble to read my letter with a little more accuracy. Had I "condemned betting as unbecoming," I should have been self-convicted, not only of inconsistency, because in the same paper I said I would lay 100 to 1 that a certain phenomenon was genuine, but of most contemptible hypocrisy. For not a week passes in which I do not bet upon a rubber of whist—my favourite and now almost only pastime—besides my nearly daily habit of playing the game for the regular money "points." And in past years I have been, to my cost, something of a gambler in other ways. I can imagine the laughter of some of my old and present friends if they heard I was pursing up my mouth and pronouncing betting "unbecoming." No; it was rather as an old sportsman, made wary by experience, certainly not as a moralist, that I took exception to Signor Damiani's challenge. For what did I say? That such challenges were "futile, because in the end nobody knows exactly which side has backed out, by objecting to conditions or attempting to impose them" and "imprudent, because every experienced investigator knows that the phenomena are not to be commanded on any given occasions, and because none of us know at all fully or accurately the conditions of success." I can assure Signor Damiani that could he have won £1,000 from Mr. Labouchere I should have chuckled exceedingly, without the ghost, or even the "shell," of a moral scruple. But his challenge rather resembled a practiced certain games of cards, as to which some players do, I believe, entertain a quasi-moral scruple, not considering it exactly unfair, but as not belonging to the legitimate game. It is known as "bluffing." There being a heavy stake in the pool, and no player before you, you have to declare an option of contending for it or not, under penalty of replacing the whole amount if you play unsuccessfully. You hold a bad hand which no commonly prudent player would play. But without a moment's hesitation, after looking at these bad cards (which no one else sees), you say, "I play," with a confident and decided air. Those who have to declare their option after you, may think you hold great cards, are, perhaps, intimidated and will not risk the contest, and you clear the pool.

Now I think Signor Damiani was "bluffing" on this occasion; for as regards the materialisation challenge he held bad cards, and even as regards psychography very doubtful ones. It is a dangerous game, and I congratulate him on not having had to play it out. He says, indeed, that he did not propose "to prove the reality of form manifestations by actual experiments with Mr. Eglinton." But does he mean to imply that his challenge did not refer to proof by experiments—fresh experiments—at all?

Then he says that I make the mistake of believing him to have pledged Mr. Eglinton's ministry without consulting him first; whereas he did consult Mr. Eglinton and obtained his promise to sit for the experiment of slate-writing. So I understood, and never said or suggested the contrary. All I said was that Mr. Eglinton was not a party to the materialisation challenge—which was to my mind by far the most objectionable of the two—and Signor Damiani does not assert that Mr. Eglinton did as a matter of fact consent to that. Really, before talking about people's "mistakes," Signor Damiani should look again to see what it is they say.

C. C. M.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—"Fidelex" (whoever he may be), in your last issue, used the expression "immorality" as applied to the Labouchere challenge. Nothing more absurd. For if attributed to Labouchere's challenge, that gentleman might tell him that as betting in this country goes on continuously from the Stock Exchange to the turf, the whole English nation must be very immoral. If "Fidelex" attached immorality to my challenge to Labouchere, when I proposed the money to go to a charity, the application of that epithet becomes doubly absurd. I hope "Fidelex" will in future recollect that the ugly word by him employed should never be used amongst gentlemen, Spiritualists, and, above all, by an anonymous writer.—Very truly yours,
29, Colville-road, Notting Hill, W. G. DAMIANI.

Miracles.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Trident," appears to me only to confuse the subject.

His definition of Law as "a certain result from a certain cause under certain conditions," is not enlightening, as it applies equally to a miracle or an accident.

TRANSITION NOTES.

The Harbinger of Light for January is just to hand, and contains the following:—

Miss Wood.

Miss Wood, the well-known medium for materialisation, died at Adelaide on the 11th of last month. In a letter of Mr. Reimers, which appeared in the December issue, it was mentioned that she was suffering from neuralgia, indicating a debilitated state of the blood, but no idea was then entertained of anything serious, but in the early part of the month, typhoid fever set in, and the patient had to be removed to the special ward of a hospital, and isolated from her friends. The fever rapidly assumed a malignant form, and in a few days the physical body becoming untenable, was abandoned by the spirit, which we doubt not has found a more appropriate tenement on the "other side." Miss Wood attained considerable fame at Newcastle some ten years since, where, in conjunction with Miss Fairlamb, she gave materialising sances, under strict test conditions, to the satisfaction of Mr. T. P. Barkas and other experienced investigators.

Mr. Defries, of Sydney, whilst on a visit to England some twelve months since, induced Miss Wood to accompany him to Sydney to give a series of sances to a number of investigators there; these sances were very carefully conducted under the supervision of Mr. H. Gale and Mr. Buckland, and gave satisfaction to quite a number of earnest inquirers.

Mr. Reimers, of Adelaide, has been most anxious for Miss Wood to visit that city, and at length succeeded in making an arrangement for her to do so. Only a few sittings had been held, giving promise of good results, when the illness which has removed her from this field of action overtook her. Our personal acquaintance with Miss Wood was of the briefest, but friends in Sydney who knew her intimately speak highly of her sincerity and other good qualities. One of the most striking events in connection with the Sydney sances was the materialisation of the late Mr. C. Cavenagh (of the General Post Office, Sydney), who was distinctly recognised by several of his personal friends.

Mr. Charles Partridge.

(From the "Banner of Light.")

This patriarch in the field of spiritual publication—for the firm of Partridge and Brittan (S.B.) was one of the very earliest in the work of putting before the people the literature of Spiritualism in the opening days of the movement—passed to his reward on Friday, January 23rd, from his country-seat, Belleville, N. J., at the age of sixty-five years.

His transition has awakened a profound sensation among the New York Spiritualists, and we are informed that a memorial service will be held by the First Society of Spiritualists of that city, of which he was a trustee, as soon as the proper arrangements can be made.

A special meeting of the Board of Directors of the American Spiritualist Alliance was to be held on Monday evening, January 26th, to take action for a like service in memory of one who was prominent among its founders, and was its Vice-President.

The New York Tribune, in speaking of his transition, remarks:—

"By the death of Charles Partridge . . . the Produce Exchange loses one of its oldest members. He was the senior member of the firm of Partridge and Smith, flour merchants, No. 17, Moore-street, and was a shrewd and successful business man. He took strong ground against dealing in 'futures.' In regard to the evils of speculation he testified before the investigating committee of the Legislature, which some time ago took evidence in this city on the subject. He was a subscriber to the gratuity fund of the Produce Exchange, and his was the ninety-seventh death that has occurred among those for whom it was instituted."

Rev. C. P. McCarthy, writing us from New York on the 25th, says of Mr. Partridge:—

"He was an old-time Spiritualist, a true humanitarian and an unwearied philanthropist. He was a director as well as the chief originator of the N. Y. Orphan Asylum, and to the last devoted to its interests. I have visited that institution with him and witnessed the love and regard of its hundreds of inmates for him, and his insight and keen business penetration and knowledge of its various departments, as well as his hearty reception as he earnestly addressed the children. Bro. Partridge, before he became a Spiritualist, was an active member of Dr. E. H. Chapin's church in this city. As a Spiritualist and an earnest lover of mankind, ever willing to help in every good work for the race, he was a remarkable man, and he will be long remembered and mourned by his numerous friends and a large circle of acquaintances who esteemed and valued his philanthropic character."

According to his view, a miracle happens whenever I take up my pen from its position of rest on the table: its movement into my hand cannot "always be repeated with unfailing accuracy," as it "depends upon the volition and intention of a superior being," and upon the "arbitrary power and caprice" of my will.

Its position is one of rest, in obedience to the law of gravity, which law is superseded by the transcendent potentiality of my human volition or caprice, which is itself subservient to the "higher law" of life and being.

Your correspondent's confusion of thought is also shown in the final paragraph of his letter, in which he states that "man could walk on water if held up by angels, and would then enact a miracle;" but if supported either by men or angels he would not walk on the water at all, but simply be carried through the air, and the water might be dispensed with as an element in the performance.

Given the facts, the explanation is to seek. Mr. Roden Noel's few words on the subject put the matter in the right light. There is no room for miracle in a domain of law, and this domain is co-extensive with the universe.—Your obedient servant,

W. N.

The "Natural" and the "Supernatural."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Glancing lately over some old copies of the Times, I found one in which was an interesting review of the Life of Dr. Johnson. In dealing with his opinions, it finds itself impelled to treat in some way the question of the supernatural in relation to them. Its attitude is singular and noteworthy. What, I should like to ask the Times critic, is "the line which divides the natural from the supernatural"? Of what kind are "matters that can be decided exclusively by human reason"? What test is to "decide the general question with regard to the possible reappearance of departed spirits," in the opinion of the Times? And let it be noted with some moderate feeling of congratulation that "the man who calls his neighbour superstitious is often objecting only to a particular kind of superstition, and that his own belief is often the greater sham of the two." Let us be joyful in a chastened sort of way. Here is the criticism in extenso:—

"Johnson was incredulous in matters which depended upon human testimony, or could be decided exclusively by human reason. When he passed the line which divides the natural from the supernatural he was on ground where these tests lost half their value. They would enable him to determine the reality of particular occurrences alleged to be supernatural, and in some cases to detect imposture, but not to decide the general question with regard to the possible reappearance of departed spirits—whether it had ever been permitted, or whether it was permitted now. If uncertainty, and curiosity, the offspring of uncertainty, on this momentous question, may be termed credulity, Johnson was credulous. He was as bitter an enemy of all 'shams' as Carlyle himself—sham grief, sham joy, sham government, sham poetry, sham religion. But he knew very well that the man who calls his neighbour superstitious is often objecting only to a particular kind of superstition, and that his own belief is often the greater sham of the two."

Yours, &c.,

A SPIRITUALIST.

I WOULD NOT SHRINK!

By REV. CHARLES BELL, D.D.—From "Songs in Many Keys."

I would not shrink if some dear ghost,
One of the dead's unnumbered host,
Should rise in silence of the night,
Shrined in an aureole of light,
And pale as snowdrop in the frost.
No! If the brother loved and lost
For me the silent river crossed,
For me left worlds all fair and bright,
I would not shrink!

Oh, if I gauge my heart aright,
Dear would the dead be to my sight!
A vision from the other coast
Of one on earth I cherished most
Would be a measureless delight.
I would not shrink!

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14TH, 1885.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT

For the Year ended 31st December, 1884.

On the 25th October, 1883, a Special Conference of the Members of the "Central Association of Spiritualists" was called "to consider the necessity of discontinuing" that Association, "and further to consider a scheme to be submitted by Mr. Stainton Moses for carrying on effectual work under other conditions."

The Liabilities of the Association at the end of 1883 involved a deficiency of £210, without realising assets, which chiefly consisted of Furniture and a valuable Library.

The Conference resolved to make over the Library to a new Society, appointing a Committee consisting of

REV. W. STANTON MOSES, M.A., *E. DAWSON ROGERS, JOHN S. FARMER, *MORELL THEOBALD,
D. G. FITZGERALD, *H. WITTHALL,
A. JOY (who has since retired), DR. G. WYLD, with power to add to their number—the instructions to this Committee being 1st, To liquidate the affairs of the original Society, and 2nd, To adopt the scheme proposed by Mr. Stainton Moses for the formation of a new Society.

The first of these objects was carried out by those Members of the Committee marked with an asterisk; and the second by all the above named gentlemen, who were joined at their invitation by

PROFESSOR CASSAL, DR. STANTHOPE SPEER,
MAJOR-GENERAL DRAYSON, ALARIC A. WATTS.

The London Spiritualist Alliance was thus launched in December, 1883, with about 100 Members, and the number during the year 1884 was increased to 140.

The Alliance has not felt itself at present sufficiently strong to take the obviously desirable step of renting a home for itself, but has during its first year met periodically at the Banqueting Room, St. James' Hall, in Regent Street. Here the general body of Members assembled for the first time on the 5th May, and the address given by the President on that occasion has been since published under the title of "Voices in the Air." The next meeting was held on the 10th June, when a paper was read by Mr. Morell Theobald and has since been published as "Spiritualism at Home." A Conversation on the 15th July closed the summer season.

On the 23rd October a Conversation was held at which General Drayson read a paper since published in "LIGHT," on "Science and the Phenomena termed Spiritual;"

and on the 19th December, Mr. Alaric A. Watts gave a paper on "Spiritualism: Some Difficulties and Some Suggestions," which was published in "LIGHT" of December 27th, 1884.

The Council have met many times during the year, and have directed their attention among other things to a dissemination of spiritual literature, not only at the Church Congress, which Mr. Farmer attended at Carlisle for this purpose, but also at the Congregational Union meeting in London, and in other channels where the truths of Spiritualism might be advantageously presented.

They have also given their attention to the promotion of Confederation amongst Spiritualist Societies throughout the world; and are in the receipt of cordial replies to their overtures.

The main work of the Alliance, which they earnestly contemplate, must rest with the Members, depending as it does on the provision of adequate means. Amongst the objects immediately in view, when the requisite funds are forthcoming, may be mentioned the opening of rooms where-in the Library and various Spiritualist papers can be placed for the use of the Members, and where a social centre may be established for the convenience of Spiritualists. With this might be associated a depot for the sale of spiritual literature.

While large sums are yearly subscribed voluntarily to support societies which have no more worthy object to attain than that sought by this Alliance, it is a matter of regret to the Council that the work before them should be hindered by lack of funds. They would hope, therefore, to be enabled in their next report to announce a large accession of members.

The Accounts for the Year, duly audited, are appended.

Signed on behalf of the Council,

W. STANTON MOSES, President.

Audited and found correct,

THEOBALD BROTHERS, AND MIALL, F.C.A.

AMERICA is often spoken of as having among its inhabitants the greatest number of Spiritualists, but it would be erroneous to suppose that they have all been convinced by professional mediums. There are very many mediums who receive no money remuneration. We learn that in Brooklyn, a suburb of New York, there are no less than seven societies, to whose sances there is gratuitous admission.—Le Spiritisme.

ROME.—Three centuries ago, by Papal authority, Jordano Bruno was burnt in Rome, and to-day a statue is raised to his memory. Free-thought begins to upset all tyrannies, and we may soon see Italy entering upon the same course of progress as Spain, which, after being the strongest bulwark of obscurantism, stands in the front among nations in which Spiritism has been established. In Rome, on the 30th of May, anniversary of the death of Voltaire, an anti-clerical congress is to be opened, to close on the 2nd of June, anniversary of the death of Garibaldi.—Le Spiritisme.

DURING Gerald Massey's stay in Sydney he lectured to crowded Sunday audiences in the Theatre Royal, Charles Bright, the usual lecturer, making way for him. At Ballarat, previously, he gave three lectures; the two first, on literary subjects, were received with unanimous approbation; the third was upon "The Devil of Darkness." When half through, the chairman felt his opinions so shocked that he rose, saying that he could no longer listen to such "twaddle"—colonial for "rubbish"—and, calling upon all good Christians to follow him, walked out; and there were seven of the audience who did so. Mr. Massey resumed, and at the conclusion received a cordial vote of thanks. Spiritualism is gaining ground here, and people are more and more openly expressing their views in defiance of the colonial Mrs. Grundy.—Sydney Correspondent of the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

XVI.

The admirable discourse of Mr. Alaric A. Watts on "Some Difficulties of Spiritualism," delivered before the London Spiritualist Alliance at St. James's Hall, has been copied at full length from "LIGHT" into the Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, U.S.A. This courteous reproduction very widely extends Mr. Watts' auditory, and can hardly fail to put many thousands of Spiritualists on their guard against seducing or ignorant spirits.

The first fact of Spiritualism is that spirits exist; the second is that they are, under some conditions, able to talk with us. It does not follow that they will in all cases tell us the truth, or even that they know the truth. Taking immortality, or even a continued existence, as a demonstrated fact, we have forty millions added to the population of the spirit world every year.

These forty millions are in every condition of development, from the rudest savagism to the highest civilisation, and varying infinitely in ideas of morals, religion, and character. This is the ever-growing spirit world of our one little planet. It is an obvious inference that every sun in the starry heavens has its world of spirits. We know that individual life survives physical death on our planet; why not on all? With an infinite number of suns and planets in space, there must be an infinite variety of spirits.

The difficulties of Spiritualism, says Mr. Watts, are those of darkness. With light they disappear. So we cry for "Light—more light!" and gladly welcome all that comes to us. To have absolute proof that spirits exist is an immense enlightenment. The difference between a trembling hope that rests on some religious teaching, and the knowledge born of actual demonstration, is something that Spiritualists alone can fully appreciate.

What can we do for our fellow men—for all we would so gladly benefit in any way—better than to give them light upon this most interesting, most important, of all things? What knowledge can be so interesting, so useful, so full of peace and joy as this assurance of a life to come? The utterly astonishing thing is that Spiritualists should not only not be eager to tell all they know to their friends, but that they should even conceal their knowledge.

The fact is that what we most fear in this world is ridicule. Within the memory of living men a gentleman whose veracity was questioned invited the questioner to meet him with sword or pistol. We have happily dispensed with duelling as a corrector of manners, and we back our assertions with a wager of money instead of the wager of battle. All the same, one who has seen a ghost generally prefers not to talk about it in mixed society.

For all that, the Spiritualist Alliance gives liberal invitations to its conferences at St. James's Hall, and in most of the large towns there are Spiritualist societies, with "Sunday Services." The good work goes on. The bulk and weight of testimony increases. Faith in the popular theologies declines. Our world brightens, our atmosphere grows clearer, and life is better worth living with every fact that proves that existence is continued with every growing glory in the world to come.

There are strong reasons why a man may conceal his knowledge of the facts of Spiritualism. For example—Is a man with a fair prospect of a Government appointment to some post of dignity and honour, with an income of £10,000 a-year, such as has just fallen to the new Bishop of London, likely to proclaim upon the housetops his belief in Spiritualism? Is a Prime Minister, fighting with the Mahdi? The Czar of Russia and the late Emperor of the French, feeling secure in their positions, did not mind it. But the Nicodemus Club is considerably larger than all our Spiritualist societies. For these reasons it is a curious thing to go to a Spiritualist meeting in London or "the Provinces," and look round upon the audience. Intelligence, firmness, and independence mark every head and countenance. You see moral courage and cheerfulness based upon a solid assurance.

"Outlook?" Yes: This is the outlook: that, as the knowledge of the facts which constitute Spiritualism increases, the characters of men and women will be changed by it so completely that a new moral world, and, to a great extent, a new physical world will be created—a new heavens and a new earth.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal vouches for the truth of a statement that a lady has been in constant familiar intercourse with a deceased brother for more than forty years. "To this day that brother is with her as naturally and really as ever—seen and heard as are others of the household. 'Thousands of times,' she says, 'I have seen him and talked with him.'" In all such cases it should be distinctly stated whether the spirit was visible and audible to only one, or to all persons present. If not, the testimony has no value except for those who do not need it.

Mr. Crookes has been a model investigator. His ghosts, or materialised spirits, were visible, audible, and tangible to all present. He, and four of his friends, each armed with a camera, in one evening, with the electric light, took forty-five photographs of a ghost, in several cases with the medium on the same plate. Now, what has Mr. Lankester to say to a series of scientific investigations, carried out with such thoroughness by a distinguished F. R. S.? The photographs exist, and there is Mr. Crookes ready to be cross-examined! If that is not reasonable proof, what is?

Henry Slade, driven from England by the persecution of Lankester and Donkin, has gone to Philadelphia to meet the scientific committee appointed to carry out investigations into the reality of Spiritual phenomena, provided by a bequest of the late Mr. Seybert. Slade, I know, from personal observation, to be a genuine medium, as he was proven to be in the most thorough way by Professor Zollner, and by many others; but he is personally so little of a hero that he allowed himself the other day to be bullied into a confession of fraud—showing for the hundredth time, perhaps, that mediumship does not necessarily give courage or morality. But as a coward or a rascal may possess any sort of physical quality or intellectual accomplishment—may be a clever artist or athlete—so may he have the qualities necessary to mediumship.

From observation I should say that a very gifted medium—one who can be readily used by spirits for their manifestations, was more liable to yield to all sorts of influences, good or bad, than others. Sensitives are continually getting into trouble. It is the hard, firm, unimpressible natures that never go astray or get into difficulties. The condition which makes one a medium for good spirits may, without special protection, make one a victim of bad ones—in the body or out of it.

Then it may be dangerous to be a medium? Not quite that. It may be dangerous to be susceptible to influences; but I have not observed that spirits out of the body are half as dangerous as men and women still in the flesh. The rule is that good spirits watch over and protect their mediums. And in any case they are, on an average, as good as the best. How often do we read in the newspapers of clergymen of various denominations who get into "trouble," while probably nineteen cases in twenty are hushed up. In itself, the belief in the presence of spirit friends must be one of the strongest restraints—one of the most powerful of protections against evil temptations that can be conceived. Crime wants secrecy.

When a man in New York gets a telegram from a friend in Liverpool, dated five hours after he receives it, he does not go about talking of forces in nature—but he buys or sells corn or cotton. Our friends in the spirit world can telegraph to us, but they do not often concern themselves with speculation in stocks or merchandise. They very seldom give us the news that comes out in due course in the morning papers. Why our spirit friends do not give us the straight tip for the Derby is a mystery. The spirit "Joey," after making a quantity of diamonds, perfect to sight and touch, but which, after being well examined, visibly melted into air, said, "I could make my medium the richest man in the world: but it might not be the best thing for him, and it might be the worst."

And here comes in Mr. Gladstone's remark about the slate-writing he had with Mr. Eglinton, that there are forces in nature we know very little about. The truth is that we know nothing at all of the real nature or mode of action of any force in nature. All are equally mysterious to us—and the wisest man in the world is just as ignorant as the most foolish. For example, I have not the least idea of the nature of electricity or its mode of action; but when I got a telegraphic message I have no doubt at all that some force was acting with intelligence at the other end of the wire, hundreds or thousands of miles away; and such intelligences are generally able to give satisfactory evidences of their individuality.

Dr. Nichols' chair story, which he told at Liverpool, is a similar fact, a little stronger, because seen by several persons, and it was, therefore, not a hallucination. In full light, a chair, standing at a distance from the spectators, first called attention by knocks on the floor, and then balanced itself on two legs, changing them from time to time, and then, at the request of the doctor, rose on two legs and deliberately walked two yards towards him, and pressed with considerable force against his knee. This curious manifestation was seen by five persons, and the chair, one with a common cane bottom, was carefully examined. It seems a silly sort of fact; but consider what it demonstrates: force acting with intelligence on matter.

"What good do spirits do us?" is a question every avowed Spiritualist is called upon to answer at least once a day. Well, one good thing they do is to prove to us that there are spirits. Is there anything they could do that is more useful? Sitting one morning in the full daylight, at a large table, with a girl—a little nursery-maid of fifteen—I heard some raps, which, if disposed and clever enough, she might have made. The thought was answered by a whizzing, jangling sound at my feet. I looked down, and saw that the table leg was clear of the floor and the brass castor set whirling. Here was a force, acting intelligently on matter without visible contact. So simple a fact carries conviction of spirit life and power.

Mrs. Oliphant is writing a spiritualistic story in Blackwood—a story of the seen and the unseen, which is very favourably noticed in The Literary World. Indeed, the elements of the so-called supernatural enter more and more into our literature. Either the demand is increasing or the supply is pressing. The spirit world seems to be urgently demanding recognition.

THE PHENOMENA OF STONE THROWING.

(From the Revue Spirite.)

Our friends at Valais write (November 11th) that a small farmhouse on the frontier, occupied by Isaac Perrin, his wife, and son, has been the scene of strange events for some time past. Household articles are thrown about or hidden, stones are cast through doors and windows, and down the chimney, dishes are taken from the table and thrown to the animals, lamps are lighted at untimely hours, firing is scattered about the hearth, and indescribable noises are heard. People come from the surrounding parts to hear and see for themselves. Curés and Capuchins have exorcised, but the invisibles mock them.

Similar facts, they say, occurred at Monthey, some miles off, eighteen months ago; but they ceased at the intervention of an old man from the Canton of Vaud. The Perrins would send for him, but our curé forbids it, because the old man is a Protestant, and therefore, say they, has no power over demons!

Our correspondents say that they belong to a nucleus of sixty Spiritualists, among whom are mediums who would willingly join a circle at the house in the hope of bringing the invading spirits to sentiments of order; they think that the younger Perrin, aged seventeen, is a medium, and that his mediumship might help; but the family is under the sway of the curé, and he is harder upon us than he is upon the old Protestant from Vaud, for he tells them that Spiritualists are the same as Freemasons, who ought all to be put an end to.

P.S.—The latest report (November 27th) is that the Perrins were recommended to cut and stab the air about the objects that had been moved, but the result had been an aggravation of their trouble, for now stones are thrown at them, and their clothes are torn.

FRAUDS AND EXPOSURES IN MEDIUMSHIP.

*Delivered in the Church of the New Spiritual Dispensation Conference, Brooklyn, N. Y., January 4th, 1885, By HENRY KIDDLE.

Fraud, and the exposure of fraud—these are not pleasant things to contemplate in connection with a subject so sacred—for such it should be—as spirit communion. But it is never allowable to ignore facts for the indulgence of sentiment, however disagreeable it may be to confront them; and it is usually an important preliminary to the attainment of truth to throw down the idols we may have enshrined in our minds and hearts, and to enshrine the actual—the matter-of-fact—in their place. The millennium has not yet arrived; humanity is still characterised by the weakness and wickedness that stand out so conspicuously in the records of the past. There may have been progress and amelioration, but the elements of human nature are very far from being purity, unselfishness and truthfulness. The opposites of these are far more potential and conspicuous in human society, notwithstanding the establishment of Christianity for more than 1,500 years, strengthened and sustained, as it has been, during that long period, by all the power of the civil government and the institutions of social life. It is not necessary for me to ask how far that social system which calls itself Christian reflects the ethical and spiritual principles of the Great Teacher, or to what extent the lives of those who are nominally His followers are based on the Divine beatitudes that fell from His lips. When the angels of this New Dispensation—for such we seem to have at this time, at least in its dawn—talk to us, they whisper the same essential truths and blessings, and for a time, at least, startle us from our sleep of materiality; but, alas! there are other voices, beguiling and ensnaring, that drown the sacred accents of the Divine messengers, and lead us back to our more accustomed sphere. We do not sufficiently heed the tender injunction of the loving and beloved disciple: "Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world." Thus we see that, in the early days of Christian Spiritualism, when the voices of spirits were listened to, when "spiritual gifts" abounded, as they do now, there were then, as now, mediums (prophets) of deceptive manifestations, as well as of the good and the true. The doors from the spirit world were open then, as they are at the present time, and the two classes of spirits came through—in the language of John, those who were "of God," and those who were not—spirits of light and spirits of darkness—the white-winged messengers of truth, and the "seducing spirits" from that sphere where every one "loveth and maketh a lie."

The material sphere in which we now dwell has one special characteristic—that of choice. Everywhere we, as the sons and daughters of Adam and Eve, are made to partake of the "fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil"; and the experience by which we are taught to discriminate between them is often a very sad one. But the lesson must be learned, because in this way alone can our individuality as responsible, self-conscious beings be perfected.

Spirit communion presents no exception to that law; it contains the elements of good and evil, and we are to be strengthened and elevated by choosing the one, and refusing the other. We cannot evade the responsibility of making that choice. We dare not dash the cup of blessing from our lips, because the poisoned bowl is by its side, and we are too indolent, too apathetic, too cowardly, to distinguish one from the other. It is the condition of life itself, for we should die of hunger or of disease, did we refuse to study the properties of the substances offered for food, and the sanitary influences that surround us, and thus learn to reject the unwholesome and the morbid.

So is it with the true and the false in Spiritualism. I ignore neither; I never have, for I conceive that both come to us with the same mission, to instruct—the one with the voice of edification, the other with that of admonition. But it is incumbent upon us to make a wise discrimination, with neither ignorance nor rashness. The tares and the wheat must usually be left to grow together, lest while we gather up the one, we root up the other. The harvest comes, when the separation can be safely and effectually accomplished.

* We give this Lecture (reported for the Banner of Light) almost in extenso, in order that the views of a large number of American Spiritualists may be clearly set before their English brethren. We hope to offer a few remarks of our own on the subject in an early issue. There is another aspect of the question, a consideration of which will, we believe, throw much light upon debated points—Ed. of "LIGHT."

The enemies of the great spiritual movement of this time find no theme so prolific as the "frauds," which they allege are perpetrated by those who are called mediums for spirit manifestation. In their public invectives against it, they usually resolve all the phenomena on which we base our knowledge of the spirit world into fraud, delusion, or misinterpretation; and fraud is said to explain the greater part. We must, of course, expect this from the enemies of our cause, the progress of which threatens their earthly interests, and the claims of which are offensive to their strongest prejudices; but, certainly, while we ought always to be faithful to the truth, as Spiritualists we should not be eager to fasten this odious charge upon mediumship, and thus to supply ammunition to its bigoted assailants, and aid them most effectually in their efforts to poison the public mind against it. When we attempt its defence, we often have to meet the statement hurled disdainfully at us: "Your best friends have to admit that the movement is permeated with fraud, and that the word medium has become almost a synonym with trickster or impostor." There may be, they sometimes admit, a small residuum of fact after excluding the result of wilful imposture; but this, they assert, is wholly due to certain unknown psychological forces, or to the psychic powers of the embodied spirit, the hypothesis of disembodied spirits being wholly unnecessary and therefore illogical. Thus Spiritualism is made to "give up the ghost," literally; and its foes exult over its lifeless remains, from which all the vivifying warmth of immortality has passed away, to give place to the death-like coldness of an extreme scientific psychism.

You all know the frantic efforts that were made to prove the Fox mediums to be tricksters—how committee after committee was appointed at the public meetings held to witness the phenomena; how disappointing the successive reports of those committees were to the people who were charging the mediums with fraud, their own committees being obliged to exculpate the accused, after a careful examination; and how those pious and respectable citizens bore their disappointment, being restrained from violently assaulting, and probably murdering, those innocent girls, only by the heroism of a small band of resolute men, who bravely confronted and held back the insensate mob, furious with scientific and religious bigotry, and maddened by their righteous zeal against fraud. This was the first ordeal passed by the New Dispensation, which then came nearer being strangled in its cradle than did the Babe of Bethlehem to falling a victim to Herod's "slaughter of the innocents."

Since that early period, the spirit manifestations have gone on with a vast increase in the number and variety of their phases, and with overwhelming demonstrations of spirit power; but there has been no intermission in the outcry of fraud against the public mediums. Indeed, there is scarcely one, however genuine or powerful, who has not thus been stigmatised.

In former years this outcry of fraud came only from the opponents of Spiritualism; but, in recent years, it is kept up quite as vigorously by many professing Spiritualists, especially in relation to manifestations which they are inclined to disbelieve and discredit. While, without doubt, this is done with good and pure motives, and the sincere desire to keep the spiritual movement free from all that tends to dishonour it in the minds of the public, I have been led to believe, from careful experience and study of the phenomena, that many serious mistakes have been made in carrying out this policy; as, I think, will be obvious from the facts I intend to present.

The Fox mediums, fortunately, after they had been scoffed at by the prejudiced, superficial witnesses in the public meetings at Rochester, were examined carefully by committees appointed for the purpose; and thus, in part (but only in part), escaped public condemnation.

In 1874, long after the "toe and knee joint theory" had been exploded, we find the English scientist, Alfred R. Wallace, bearing the following testimony "in favour of one of those mediums (Mrs. Kate Fox Jencken):—

"We have here a career of twenty-six years of mediumship of the most varied and remarkable character; mediumship which has been scrutinised and tested from the first hour of its manifestation, down to this day, and with one invariable result—that no imposture or attempt at imposture has ever been discovered, and no cause ever been suggested that will account for the phenomena except that advanced by Spiritualists."

The phase of manifestation which has especially encountered the charge of fraud is that which is known as "full-form materialisation;" in connection with which the "exposures" of mediums, apparently guilty of imposture in personating spirit-forms, have not only brought public odium upon mediumship and Spiritualism, but have been made the means of discrediting many of the most earnest adherents of the cause, who are, even now, I am sorry to say, charged with "condoning fraud," because they present facts, as well as theories supported by facts, that go far toward the partial or entire exculpation of the accused mediums, and the vindication of mediumship in general.

It certainly cannot be right or expedient to make sweeping denunciations against the intellectual and moral integrity of a large class of intelligent and earnest Spiritualists. Surely this is not requisite to strengthen the defence of truth against falsehood, purity against immorality, or genuine mediumship against that which is spurious and fraudulent.

There is a very serious question concerned in this matter—a question the proper solution of which is rapidly being reached by the intelligent, fair-minded students of spiritual phenomena and laws; and if any one thinks he can affect the decision by attacking the motives or aspersing the character of those who have taken either side of it, he will find himself greatly mistaken. It would be no triumph, but a great misfortune, to divide the present spiritual army into two hostile camps. Differ we must in our interpretations of many of the phenomena, but difference of opinion is not inconsistent with fraternal feeling and mutual respect and good will, unless it incite to personal insult or detraction, to which no true disciple of spirit-communion will ever descend. If I commend a medium whom another has condemned as unreliable, it does not prove that I have "condoned a fraud." The inference is, indeed, quite the reverse; since my experience must have been totally different, and that experience should be respected.

In what I intend to say on this subject I shall present only well-attested facts, and the conclusions of investigators of mature experience and superior intelligence; and these should be attentively considered, without prejudice or partisanship. I make no plea for "charity" toward wrong-doers justly condemned. Let the guilty suffer; but let no penalty be inflicted before a fair trial, lest in the end it reflect lasting disgrace upon both judge and executioner. I do not know but that, with some persons, it may be "easier to be charitable than to be just"; but I do know that it is always vastly easier to be uncharitable than to be just. It is not, however, charity, but truth, as well as justice, that is concerned in a careful discussion of the principles by which mediumship should be tested, and the cause of deceptive manifestations demonstrated and exposed. The personal element is, in fact, a subordinate one; for the progress of spiritual science depends, in no small degree, upon a knowledge of those principles. I trust, therefore, I shall not be misunderstood; I offer no apology or excuse for those who have profaned the sacred gifts of Heaven by fraud, or counterfeited the evidences of immortality; let them suffer the just consequences of their guilt; but let not the innocent suffer in consequence of our rashness and ignorance.

The great question is: On what principles and by what methods are we to determine the guilt or innocence of mediums charged with the perpetration of fraud while in the exercise of their mediumistic gifts? This is the primary question; and next to it, but of the greatest importance to us as responsible representatives of this spiritual movement, is: What is the proper course to pursue toward those who have been found guilty of fraudulent acts in connection with their mediumship?

It will be observed that, in both these questions, I refer only to those who are really mediums—whose mediumistic gifts have been clearly proved to exist; and, also, that I refer only to acts committed in the exercise of their peculiar vocation. The simulation of mediumship by artful pretenders, that is, the perpetration of what have been aptly called "Truesdell's tricks," presents a different, and scarcely cognate, subject for consideration, as indeed, does also the moral character or conduct of mediums, apart from the exercise of their special vocation, or as ordinary members of the community. The common laws and usages of society provide for such cases, irrespective of any spiritualistic policy. I admit that offences committed in the name of mediumship, or by those endowed with that Divine gift, should be followed by a heavier rather than a lighter penalty; but experience has certainly taught us the truth of what I read recently in the English Spiritualist paper, "LIGHT," "the moral character of a medium has about as much to do with the reality or excellence of his mediumship as the moral character of a singer or actor has to do with the quality of his art." While I should object to the use of the word excellence in that connection, there is no denying the fact that the natural endowments of mediumship may, and often do, co-exist with great defects of character. Since we are now demonstrating to the world truths that can be made known only through mediumship, it is a precious gift, and should never be ruthlessly condemned and cast away, but judiciously encouraged and employed. I hold most strongly that no medium can be really excellent who is not moral and spiritual; and yet many of the mediums who have been most successful in proving to the world our grand truths of spirit existence and return, could claim but little of those qualities. We must separate the man from his gifts.

In my distribution of this subject I have been careful to make this distinction, from the disregard of which much injustice and incalculable injury to our cause have resulted. Indeed, the spiritual movement, on this account chiefly, now presents to many an appearance which, in Shakespeare's poetical parlance, may be likened to "A tangled chain, nothing impaired, but all disordered."

One of the most significant facts to which I desire to call your attention, previous to a discussion of the main question, is, that all the most serious "exposures" that have had so disastrous an effect upon public opinion in regard to Spiritualism have happened in connection with mediums of established genuineness, usually after a protracted series of successful and startling manifestations that had greatly impressed the public mind.

In regard to these several so-called "exposures" of the medium Slade, which I only refer to as being typical, in a certain measure, of many other such cases, let me say that I accept none of the statements that have appeared in the newspapers. The English case, as presented in court, shows the contemptible character of the effort at exposure made by the two learned scientists, the utter falsity of the exultant claims set up, and the impossibility of a medium's obtaining justice in what is called a "court of justice." The lessons it teaches should be applied to other cases; and we who profess to be Spiritualists should never condemn the humblest medium on ex parte statements or on the testimony of prejudiced, ignorant observers. The case should be carefully considered in all its parts, and both sides should be heard.

But some will, perhaps, reply: This is generally true; but what if the medium is caught in flagrante delicto, as when the spirit is seized and the "exposer" finds the medium in his arms? "Spirit-grabbing" is the method of testing the genuineness of materialisation most readily suggested to the inexperienced observer. Like blackening the trumpet, to which I have referred, it seems to be an experimentum crucis.

The effect of experience has been to show to thinking, dispassionate students of spiritual phenomena, that the customary methods of fraud-exposure are really of no value—that "spirit-grabbing" proves nothing, either as to the genuineness or the honesty of the medium. This has now become the position of many of the most intelligent and experienced investigators. The letter written by Alfred R. Wallace in October, 1882, in reference to the "exposure" of Miss Wood, sets forth, in the most lucid manner, the philosophy of this subject. Let me cite a few short paragraphs:—

"It is my deliberate conviction—accepting the reality of these phenomena as witnessed personally, and as narrated by a crowd of competent observers, and deducing from them the obvious and close material and spiritual connection of the form and medium—that the fact of a person's seizing the form and finding the medium is not, and cannot be, a proof of fraud, but is, in all probability, the natural and inevitable effect of trying to keep apart two beings who are really one, and who cannot be rudely interfered with without danger to the human body whose abnormal organisation supplies the material for the temporary materialisation of these unworldly existences." . . . "I maintain that this is the only hypothesis which the facts directly support; and, therefore, the only 'exposure' made is of the incapacity of experimenters, who deal with the greatest mysteries of an unknown universe as if they were mere questions of terrestrial mechanics."

To this Mr. Wallace suggestively added:—

"So far as I remember, every medium for materialisation, however perfectly their powers may have been tested, however good their character, has been subjected to accusations of fraud on somewhat similar grounds to those alleged against Miss Wood. The fact that whenever a form has been seized, it has been found, after a struggle of some moments' duration, to merge into the medium, lends additional support to the view here advanced. . . . I believe that even where the medium and form have been seen separate, a forcible seizure would result in their speedy amalgamation."

In regard to this view of the case, Mr. Stainton Moses—"M.A. (Oxon)"—said: "It is a hopeful sign that experienced Spiritualists are beginning to see what Mr. Wallace so well puts, that 'catching a spirit' proves nothing of logical necessity. It is probable, nay almost certain, that any such seizure would place the medium in the hands of the seizer of the form, if that form were as substantial and solid as they usually are." And very recently in one of the series of articles in "LIGHT," to which I have already referred, this cautious and intelligent writer remarks:—

"It will not be until our knowledge is very considerably advanced that we shall be able to see how dangerous, how ignorant, how foolish were the methods all but universally adopted up to that date (1882). We shall know then, as we do not now, how illusory are the appearances that lie on the surface; how fatuous the solution of a perplexity attempted by those who 'seized a spirit' in order to show that it was in fact the medium."

Thus, according to these and many other of the best experts in spiritualistic investigation, "spirit-grabbing" is not a proper and reliable method of testing the guilt or innocence of suspected or accused mediums; (1) because, even when a separate form is materialised, a forcible seizure of that form must place the medium in the hands of the seizer; and (2) because, when a separate form is not materialised, and the entranced medium has been brought from the cabinet, and made to personate the spirit, in a more or less changed or transfigured condition, it is the intelligence back of the medium who is responsible for the act; and if fraud is committed, the medium may be wholly guiltless. This may come within the category of deceptive manifestations, to fix the responsibility for which is always a problem of considerable perplexity. Obviously, the influences of the circle are not to be wholly disregarded in accounting for the presence of deceptive spirits. We are bound to consider (1) the general character of the sitters, (2) their condition of mind while holding the circle, and (3) their manner of holding it. There can be no doubt that a large circle of positive-minded sitters constitutes a battery, the power of which scarcely any medium or his guides could resist; and in that case the circle would be wholly responsible for the manner in which the medium might be used, and even articles of dress, drapery, &c., might be brought in to consummate a fiasco, and the disgrace or ruin of the medium; for the powers of the lower spirits acting through strong physical mediumship can scarcely be limited, though I believe they are always held in check, while they are at the same time permitted to have a temporary sway, so that mortals may learn the lessons they need.

Of course, we cannot expect that the outside world will understand or accept this doctrine of spirit intervention, which is the outcome of much experience and study of the manifestations; and while promiscuous circles are held, we must anticipate that those who have little or no experience will derisively reject this explanation. As Mr. Sargent well says, "The frauds charged upon approved mediums raise questions the answer to which will be naturally sought by those not intimately acquainted with the history of the phenomena." We must be prepared for the fate of all advocates of new and unpopular truths—namely, to be scoffed at and abused. This can be avoided only by a tergiversation which no person worthy to be called a Spiritualist would think of for a moment. We must follow Truth wherever it may lead us.

Those who have suggested the fact of the transfiguration of the medium as explanatory of much that has been perplexing in these experiences, have been subjected to a great deal of derision and aspersion, as desiring to palliate the guilt of the mediums; but this phenomenon is by no means unfamiliar to experienced investigators. Mr. Sargent, it has been seen, recognises it. The elongation of the medium Home—a kind of transfiguration—was certified to by the Committee of the London Dialectical Society many years ago; and Allan Kardec, in the "Book of Mediums," speaks of a young girl who took on at certain times, all the appearances, including voice and speech, of deceased persons, among them that of her deceased brother, presenting not only his face, but the height, size, and even weight of his body. Mr. Sargent refers to this circumstance in the "Scientific Basis."

The facts which I have already cited show how difficult and puzzling a problem is presented by the scientific aspects of the phenomenon known as materialisation. Indeed, all mediumship, including even that of inspiration, presents questions of similar complexity; but in connection with that more sensuous form of spirit manifestation, these difficulties are apparently intensified because they are more conspicuous to ordinary observation. I am glad to see that trance-mediumship is now undergoing a very careful analysis, as to its processes and results, particularly with the view to discriminate between what comes from the spirit-intelligence, and what is the result of the medium's own mind or the minds of other persons present. When I look at these things in their suggestiveness, catching but a glimpse, as any of us can, of the subtle and profound principles underlying them, I feel that we are only at the threshold of spiritual science; and that to be rash, dogmatic and condemnatory in our conclusions in regard to these matters of which our knowledge is so superficial, is the part of extreme folly and presumption.

In investigating these phenomena, the very first thing that strikes us with startling force is the controlling intelligence which we seek back of every manifestation. That intelligence is the essence of it all; to it all else is secondary. All sensuous phenomena, including these marvellous forms that pass before our eyes, are comparatively unimportant, because they can never be anything but an imperfect representation of the spirit. The term materialisation is, in this regard, a misnomer; for spirit can never be materialised, though it may, for the time being, clothe itself in these extemporized material forms. Not once, however, in a hundred times can a spirit completely express what it conceives, and wishes to present, in this way. But it can oftener give expression to the intelligence which is the very essence of its personality. When, therefore, we see these invisible intelligences—whom we so often recognise as the "loved and lost" of earth—striving to make themselves visible to us, by a process which they, in part at least, understand, but of which we absolutely know nothing, why should we intervene to dictate to them the methods and conditions of their work? Does not reason, or common-sense, require that we should leave it to them to select their own methods of presentation, we patiently, though critically, scanning the results, and learning the lessons which they convey? In connection with this, let me quote words, very recently penned, of Mr. Stainton Moses. Speaking of what have been strongly insisted upon as "test conditions," he says:—

"Some, in times past, have relied upon a more or less careful tying of the medium, so as to make the normal use of his body impossible. They considered that they had accounted for the medium when they had bound him hand and foot. I am glad to think that this fallacy is exploded. The assumption on which it was founded ignored altogether the power of spirit over matter. . . . To tie up a medium and put him into a dark cabinet is, first of all, a sheer waste of effort; and, next, introduces into the experiment a plain source of error."

That is to say, it emanates from a spirit of suspicion, if not something worse, and thus draws to the circle a crowd of mischievous spirits, who use the entranced medium as the instrument of their frolic or their malice. Mr. Stainton Moses then expresses his approval of the principle I have referred to as the proper one to guide in these investigations. He says:—

"I used to favour in my own researches, as the most useful and simple plan of dealing with these occult subjects, to let the invisible operator present what he wishes to show under conditions of his own selection. Let him tell me what he wishes me to do to aid him. Then when he has done, let me endeavour to have the phenomena reproduced under other conditions, if possible, in such a manner as will give the best evidence of their genuineness, and enable me to give them the most careful and intelligent study."

Experience has shown that by the application of this principle the integrity of the medium never enters as an element into the question; and thus the most convincing manifestations are obtained and the best evidences of genuineness presented. The demon of suspicion is exorcised by the overwhelming power of the spirit of truth reigning in the circle; and the minds of all present receive an unalterable conviction that they have indeed looked on the forms and faces and listened to the voices of visitants from the spirit-spheres, not because of their credulity, as sometimes charged, but because the proofs presented have been irresistible to the keenest intellect and the most critical observation. I have described, on other occasions, the varied tests that have been given to me in this manner, by means of which a perfect conviction of the truth of materialisation has been definitely established in my mind. Many others of longer experience will confirm what I say in this regard; though some may be so constituted as to be satisfied only with bolts and bars. I do not reflect upon the sincerity or integrity of these persons. Let all use their best judgment.

While the phenomenal phase of Spiritualism continues to be as prominent as it is at the present time, and promiscuous circles are held under conditions so crude, so imperfect, and indeed so often utterly bad, we must expect that the results, however convincing, of spirit-power and spirit-return to those who witness them, will not always be congenial or satisfactory to the mind that has advanced beyond that low grade of spirituality. We must, however, bear in mind that Spiritualism comes to all classes and every grade of mankind, and that, in most cases, it must reach the senses ere it can touch the heart. Hence, even the lower phases of mediumship are greatly in demand, and, if we would help on the conversion of mankind to a knowledge of spirit-return, we must foster, not discourage it. We must recognise, and try to teach the outside world the peculiar dangers to which public mediums are exposed, and throw around them, as a protectingegis, our own personal influence, instead of covering them with obloquy and treating them as criminals and outlaws. I have endeavoured to show how difficult it is, in the case of a perfectly genuine and honest medium, to prevent the occurrence of circumstances that may give rise to what is called an "exposure," and all the seeming evidence of guilty contrivance. Then how careful should all of us be not to settle the question of guilt too hastily, or before a careful sifting of all the evidence and the testimony of every person present, yea, as careful as if the charge were of the highest crime known to the law!

And now, to come to my second question; suppose the medium to be found guilty—I do not mean, please to remember, of simulating mediumship, but of presenting, or aiding to present, deceptive manifestations; for a genuine medium may be guilty in either of these ways, either as a kind of particeps criminis with his guides or familiars, who wish to make a startling manifestation beyond their assured ability; or to supplement the work of the spirits by his own contrivances of disguise and personation. Suppose, for example, the intention to commit fraud has been established by finding on the medium's person paraphernalia evidently prepared for the purpose; what course are we justified in taking in such cases? I answer we are not only justified, but obligated to inflict upon the offender, after a careful consideration of every mitigating circumstance, the penalty due to the offence. We are not, however, justified in going beyond the truth; we are not justified in a wholesale condemnation of his or her mediumship, and in discrediting its results, past, present, and future, as well as those persons who have witnessed them and certified to their genuineness. We may condemn the individual, if it becomes our special duty to condemn, but not the mediumship.

Is not this the course pursued in the case of other gifted people—actors, artists, musicians, poets, and sometimes even clergymen? Do we not discriminate between the genius of Byron, Burns, and Poe, for example, and their character as individuals? The world recognises this distinction and accepts the fruits of genius, basks in the radiance of its splendour and glory, while it is often saddened and disgusted with the earthliness and sensuality that are frequently its personal concomitants. We cannot control this, if we would, for true mediumship, like brilliant genius—which is, indeed, only another kind of mediumship—will always command attention, let us rail against its possessor as we will. The woman of Endor exercised her gifts even while Saul was rigidly enforcing the bloody Judaic laws by which it was sought to crush out all resort to those having familiar spirits. When the great psychographic medium, whose splendid gifts have emblazoned the Spiritualism of this time, fell (as fall he did), there was no attempt to hunt him down and make him an eternal outcast. His fault was "condoned" even by the Spiritualistic Draco of this time, under the plea that "each seance must stand on its own merits," he being a medium beyond all denial or equivocation. So when the great platform test-medium fell into discredit, the spoils of his so-called "exposure" having been captured, like those which, it is said, have been taken from materialising mediums, indicating an attempt at "personation," or the simulation of spirit-presence, this was "condoned," and due consideration was given to the medium's own statement of the case. If this is right, as it assuredly is, let the same principles be applied in all cases; but let us not bring mediumship into general reproach and condemnation for the occasional faults of a few individuals.

Spiritualism, in its essential principles, is as pure, as good, as exalted, and holy as the angels from whom its teachings come to bless mankind and help them on their way through the mire and darkness of this world. Humanity, however, although comparatively progressed, is still held in the thrall of earthly passions and vices; it still lingers on a low spiritual plane, and always contaminates, more or less, whatever comes in contact with it. Thus was it with the beautiful spiritual teachings of Him of Galilee; and so is it now with the angelic doctrines and precepts of the New Dispensation. In vain did the Divine Teacher say, "Judge not, and ye shall not be judged; condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned"; for no sooner did those who claimed to be His followers form an organisation, through which they gained power, than they erected a despotic tribunal both to judge and to condemn, and thus to bind men's consciences in ecclesiastical chains. I hope the day is far distant when the representatives of Spiritualism will be able to establish any such tribunal; or when any man connected with the movement will be sustained in a dictatorial censorship to pardon or condemn whomsoever, in his judgment, he may deem culpable—to "condone" or anathematise the frailties of his co-workers, or doom to everlasting ignominy all who refuse to bow at his shrine or acknowledge his supremacy.

Only a few words more in conclusion. I am no more phenomenonalist, as those who know me are well aware. The principles which I advocate to-day are to myself, personally, rather speculative than practical. While I have never, I think, undervalued the phenomena, I have always viewed them as really subordinate to those higher and grander truths which can find no sensuous, external expression, and in which the true value and glory of Spiritualism consist. But I do not forget that, without the sensuous demonstrations, the light of that higher truth would never have dawned upon my soul. They it was that led me to the door of the spiritual temple, the pathway to which I should never otherwise have discovered. Now, though I may need them no longer, there are many, many others who are as much in want of their aid as I once was; and, hence, I endeavour to defend them, to protect the instruments through whom alone they can be presented, and to shield them from unmerited obloquy and condemnation. And there is another consideration: spiritual science, now in its infancy, can expand and develop only by a rational use of mediumship—a use regulated not by gross materialistic conditions, but by an application of those subtle principles which spiritual exploration can alone ascertain.

I do not believe that any of us have any favour to bestow on fraud or its perpetrators. We all alike detest it, and would zealously banish it from our sacred cause. Let us then all work together, cultivating respect for each other, and not permitting intellectual differences to disturb our spiritual harmony.

At Vienna, Baron Hellenbach, who introduced H. Bastian to the Court, has brought out a book in which he discusses and affirms the Spiritist doctrine.—Le Spiritisme.

Now that so much attention is attracted to the Arabs in the Soudan, the following proverb may be of interest:—"Allah has written a man's character in three places: in his head, face, and hand, one at least of which is generally uncovered for inspection."

GEORGE ELIOT.—I have just read the "Life of George Eliot," a deeply interesting book, but, like her novels, deeply steeped in sadness. Mrs. Stowe seems to have made repeated efforts to interest her in Spiritualism, but she seems to have felt a strong prejudice against professional mediumship and its phenomenal performances. Her mind was, however, so large, open, and truthful that one cannot but feel that, had the subject been presented to her in its philosophic aspects, she would have received it with the intensity of her nature. On p. 424, Vol. III., her biographer and second husband records these words: "She told me that in all she considered her best writing there was a not herself which took possession of her, and that she felt her own personality to be merely the instrument through which this spirit, as it were, was acting." This passage seems to confess mediumship in its highest sense, viz., that inspiration through which all the highest ideas in religion, poetry, art, and science have been given to mankind; the Divine Mind, directly or indirectly, expressing itself through the spiritual centre of the human soul.—G.W., M.D.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

IMPROMPTU REPLIES THROUGH A LADY PSYCHIC OF VERY LIMITED EDUCATION.

By T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

In the year 1875 I was invited to attend a series of sances that were being held in the humble residence of a young married lady, a non-professional medium, in Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The sances were held in a small and plainly furnished sitting-room; the table used was made of ordinary deal, and stood on four legs, the top being about 4ft. by 2ft.

On the table lay MS. books and pencils provided by myself. All questions were asked by being written in the MS. books at the moment of asking, and the hand of the medium immediately replied to them in writing. I have the whole of the MS. books containing questions and answers in my possession at the present time, and they may be examined by any earnest inquirer.

The problem at issue is this: a comparatively uneducated woman replied to critical scientific and other questions for thirty-seven evenings, three hours each evening, in such a manner as probably no other man or woman in England could do.

I am far from affirming that every answer is correct, and in the best possible form, because it is very improbable that any human being in this world, or any human intelligence who has departed into the next world, could, instantaneously, and without special opportunities of research, answer in the best manner, and with absolute accuracy, long series of questions on various scientific and other subjects; but this I venture to affirm, that not one of the adverse critics of Spiritualism, including Mr. Labouchere and Mr. R. A. Proctor, could, under similar circumstances, reply to the questions with equal conciseness and accuracy.

I may state that the witnesses at the sances were usually about six in number, that they are tolerably well-known living persons, and that any one of them would confirm my statements.

I may also remark that full details of the mode in which the sances were conducted, the autobiography of the medium, typical questions and answers, &c., &c., are to be found in the Psychological Review, Vol. I., p. 215, October, 1878.

It is necessary to bear in mind that the medium was a very moderately-educated woman, that she sat in the presence of critical observers, that the questions were written and read aloud at the moment they were being asked, that the replies were given in writing in the same MS. book in a rapid and impromptu manner, without opportunity for reference, revision, or correction, that the questions were upon many scientific and other subjects with which ladies generally are unfamiliar, that the lady medium affirmed her entire unacquaintance with the subjects, and said that her hand wrote them automatically, without her being conscious of the correctness or incorrectness of the replies, and that those who knew her best stated that she had no taste for scientific studies, no access to scientific books, and, so far as they knew, had not given science any consideration.

The departed person who, for the most part, professed to control the hand of the medium, and professed to be the author of the replies to the questions, was according to his representation an American who had pursued his studies in Germany, and who departed this life about thirty years ago.

Occasionally very able replies were alleged to be given by a departed person giving the name of John Harrison.

Other and very peculiar controls took possession of the hand of the medium, and wrote characteristic replies which varied very much in their composition, and maintained their peculiar idiosyncracies of composition and caligraphy whenever they used the medium's hand for the purpose of writing.

All these peculiarities of writing and composition may be seen in the MS. books now in my possession, and all of them I saw written by or through the hand of the lady medium of very limited education.

Whatever theory may be adopted as most satisfactory, unquestionably the hand of the medium unpremeditatedly wrote the replies.

At the first three sances I devoted myself to observing the manner in which the proceedings were conducted, and ascertained that miscellaneous questions were verbally asked and were replied to by the hand of the medium in writing; that elaborate drawings were produced in total darkness; and that closed and sealed letters were also read in darkness. I was not sufficiently familiar with the proceedings up to that period to say positively that all these phenomena were perfectly genuine, but at the fourth sance the mode of proceeding was left practically under my own control, and I asked, in writing, all the questions in suitable MS. books, and in the same MS. books I have the whole of the replies written by the hand of the medium. Nearly all the questions were asked by myself, and I know they were not, previous to asking, known to any one else in the room. Occasionally, questions were asked by those present which I reduced to writing in the MS. book that also contains the replies. I can vouch for the fact that the replies must have been spontaneous, and cannot possibly have been previously prepared by the medium. Assuming that the hand of the medium was guided by a highly-trained scientist, or by highly-trained scientists, the answers are easily explained, but on any other hypothesis they are inexplicable, as neither I nor any other persons at the sance could have answered many of the questions, and the theory of thought-reading, therefore, is quite untenable.

The question resolves itself into this: either the statements I am now making are true, or I am guilty of deliberate lying, and those who know me best will be best able to judge of the probability of the latter hypothesis.

At the fourth séance, held August 9th, 1875, there were present, including the medium, two ladies and five gentlemen. Among other questions I asked the following, and received the annexed replies:—

QUESTION. What are harmonics?

ANSWER. By harmonics are meant those sounds caused by the nodes or ventral segments of stringed instruments which occur in succession.

Q. Are the harmonics in an organ pipe the same as those on strings?

A. Certainly not; in organ pipes they occur in the middle of the pipe in closed ones; in stringed instruments, just wherever the nodes are placed.

Q. Do different notes give different numbers of harmonics?

A. Certainly, but it depends upon the temperature of the atmosphere what number of harmonics are sounded.

Q. Do you possess the knowledge you are giving us yourself or are you obtaining it from others? if so, from whom?

A. It was a subject I used to be interested in. I had some knowledge of music, instrumental music, but any information I may have given you is my own, and you are welcome to it.

Q. How is the sense of sound conveyed to the mind?

A. This is a disputed subject. Of course you know that sound, like light and heat, is motion, and is caused by particles of air being set in motion; as you call the amplitude of vibration, these particles are moved in backward and forward motions, causing a sound wave to be propagated, which, falling upon the ear in close contact with the tympanum, causes the auditory nerve to vibrate and thus convey a sense of sound to the sensorium.

Q. Why do two similar sounds produce silence and two dissimilar sounds do not?

A. Because the waves meeting each other stop the progress of each other. Take two tuning forks in either hand, strike them both with equal force and touch the ends on the table, the waves meeting in this manner you will see that the crest of each wave will intercept each other. The experiments are worth trying.

Q. If two meteors met in space which is supposed to be almost a vacuum, would noise be the result?

A. I should say that no sound whatever would be produced, since a sound cannot be produced in a vacuum.

At this séance I asked seventeen questions, to which relevant replies were given; seven of those questions and answers I have quoted literally.

The fifth séance was devoted to questions on music, and the sixth séance to questions relative to the controller's experiences on entering his new life. The replies to those questions shall appear in my next communication. The answers respecting the future life are very interesting.

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

My fifth séance with Husk, held on the 12th inst., was unproductive of any additional evidence of an unanswerable kind.

He still wears my ring No. 2, and puzzles all sceptics by its exhibition.

Medical men admit that it could not be forced intact off his hand except at the cost of destroying his hand; and practical mechanics admit that to weld the ring on his wrist would be beyond their power.

Should the ring still be on his wrist on the 26th, Mr. Husk will hope to attend the Spiritualist Alliance Conversation at St. James's Hall, at 7 p.m., for inspection.

"SPIRITUALISM AT HOME."

II.

By FRANK PODMORE, M.A.

In my last letter I discussed the most important and interesting of a long series of written messages which have made their appearance in Mr. Theobald's house, and I showed that there was nothing abnormal or extraordinary in the writings themselves, as they were in every case copied from a well-known source. I pointed out, moreover, that in ascribing to Saadi poems which he never wrote, and to Wamik a life which he never lived, and in distorting the rhythm and the sense and the grammar of the poetry, the copyist had made some very human and by no means extraordinary blunders.

There are, of course, a large number of other quotations written in the same way, of the origin of which I am ignorant; but one is, perhaps, justified in the belief that a more prolonged search and a wider acquaintance with current literature, would reveal their source.

It may still be the case that the writings are produced in some abnormal manner, though the evidence for this is, on the face of it, insignificant.

But the written messages are not the only strange incidents which have occurred in Mr. Theobald's house. Fires have been lit, breakfast-tables laid, teapots filled, and other domestic offices performed by an agency whose operations, at any rate, have been invisible to Mr. Theobald. All those who have read Mr. Theobald's articles will probably share his conviction that all these phenomena must be traced to the same source. Through whatever agency the poetry was written, it was, no doubt, through the same agency that fires have been lit; and evidence which throws any light upon the genesis of some one of the phenomena throws light in the same measure upon all. Now, when we come to ask how all these things were done, there are three hypotheses which present themselves as antecedently possible:—

I. That they are due to the action of some extra-physical agency, which we may call spirits, or psychic force, or anything else. This is, I take it, Mr. Theobald's view.

II. That they are the work of human hands, working deliberately and with intent to deceive. That, I apprehend, would be the view of the unregenerate world.

III. But to those conversant with such inquiries a third hypothesis will present itself, as at least conceivable, viz.: that these effects, while they involved the action of only the ordinary physical forces, did not necessarily imply conscious fraud on the part of any person concerned in their production. In other words, we may suppose that the fires were lit, the poetry written, and the kettles filled, by some person in a state akin to somnambulism: a state in which only automatic and unconscious actions are performed. There is good reason to believe that many of the so-called "physical phenomena" of the séance have their origin in a state of this kind; and every person who has investigated the subject at all must be very familiar with the manifestations of automatic writing and speaking.

Now, to establish the first hypothesis we shall need, of course, the strictest and most impregnable evidence. Even those who admit the possibility of physical effects from an extra-physical cause, must admit also that they are of rare occurrence. To determine, however, whether in any given case the second or third of the hypotheses above indicated is the more probable must be a matter of some difficulty. Demonstrative proof is, indeed, rarely possible: it is a question, in most cases, of personal character—of presumed integrity, that is, of the person concerned. Now, it is to be observed that Mr. Theobald, whilst maintaining the first hypothesis as the true one, supports his position, as a rule, by evidence of the most flimsy and insufficient character. He does not attempt, that is, to set forth adequately in each case the evidence which, to his mind—for we must, of course, assume that he has himself some grounds for his belief, though he does not state them—is sufficient to establish the abnormal nature of the incident described. If he had been consistent in this course, it would not have been worth my while to write this letter. A man who, without any evidence on which to base his conviction, will believe in marvels such as these, on the sole ground that they are agreeable to his hopes or his prepossessions, is not, of course, to be argued with. Such a belief may be held to be above reason, or below it. It is, at all events, outside the province of reason. But Mr. Theobald has not been consistent. He has, on occasion, brought forward evidence purporting to prove the abnormal nature of these occurrences. How far that evidence falls short of establishing what he desires to establish, I propose now to discuss. I will premise that I received last spring a vide voce account of these occurrences from Mr. Theobald, and that, subsequently, on his invitation, I went down in my capacity as a member of the Society for Psychical Research, together with Mr. F. S. Hughes, at that time secretary to one of the committees of that society, in order to examine the scene of the occurrences. The following comments—which have been submitted to and approved by my colleague, Mr. F. S. Hughes—are mainly founded on our observations at the time of that visit.

It will be convenient if the subject of the writings is first discussed. In most cases, as readers of "LIGHT" are aware, the conditions under which the writings have been produced are not such as to exclude any of the three hypotheses above mentioned. As a general rule the writings have been found on casual sheets of paper placed on a table in an unoccupied room, or inside a diary, or under the cover of a newspaper. But, whilst the writing itself is, in nearly all cases, of a very curious and unusual character, it has also, on certain occasions, been produced under conditions which, as described by Mr. Theobald, appear to render ordinary human agency highly improbable.

First, as to the character of the writing. Mr. Theobald speaks of this ("LIGHT," p. 245) as "utterly out of the range of ordinary human writing." He showed Mr. Hughes and myself numerous specimens of the writing so described. It is remarkably regular and even, and unusually small. I reckoned that, of the smallest writing, about seventy lines would be contained in the length of a half-sheet of common notepaper. But I saw no specimen which was not perfectly legible to the naked eye, and which could not be equalled in minuteness and clearness by most educated persons without any very severe exercise of patience.

On the ceilings and walls the character of the writing is somewhat different. The writing on the ceilings of the rooms is, in every case, large and straggling, in curious contrast to the tiny and well-formed writing on the paper. There are, however, two or three sentences on the ceiling in the hall, and above the lintel of the door, which are regularly and evenly written, and in a much smaller handwriting. Now, it is noteworthy that the inscribed portion of the ceiling in the hall, and the wall above the door, would be within the reach of a person of ordinary stature, standing upon a chair; whilst the other ceilings, and the cornices, as Mr. Theobald correctly informs us ("LIGHT," p. 246), would be beyond the reach of any person mounted on a chair or on steps; but not, of course, beyond the reach of such a person armed with a broomstick having a pencil attached to the end.

Thus much of the indications to be drawn from the character of the writing itself as to its probable source. In the second place, the writing, as Mr. Theobald tells us, has been produced (1) in locked receptacles, (2) in his own presence at a séance, (3) under certain exceptional conditions, which appeared to exclude normal agency. We will describe these in order. (1) Written messages of some length, and in various languages, have been found on several occasions in locked drawers and cupboards; notably, on two occasions at least (pp. 245, 248) in Mr. Theobald's private secretaire of which he always carries the key with him. Mr. Theobald showed Mr. Hughes and myself the piece of furniture in question, having a substantial wooden flap of considerable thickness, and, apparently, a lock of good construction. Mr. Theobald also indicated the precise spot on which he had found one of the written messages referred to. When he had again closed and locked the secretaire, Mr. Hughes, in his presence and mine, pushed half-a-sheet of note-paper through the crevice at the top of the flap, and, by means of a second half-sheet, gave it such impetus, that it fell on almost the same spot as that already indicated as the locale of the "spirit message." This demonstration that the "test" of the locked secretaire was worthless, occurred before the publication of the account in "LIGHT," June 14th, in which this "test" is described without a hint of its real value. (2) The writing has been produced in Mr. Theobald's own presence at a séance ("LIGHT," pp. 245, 246, 343, &c.), the medium being within the cabinet, and secluded from the view of the circle. Mr. Theobald has not described in "LIGHT" what evidence he has for his statement that the messages were actually written in the séance at the time; but this is one of the points on which Mr. Hughes and I made special inquiry. With reference to one message of considerable length, which purported to have been written under these conditions in an abnormally brief period, we asked Mr. Theobald whether he had examined the paper on which the message was written before the séance began. His reply—and it is noteworthy, as illustrating his attitude towards these occurrences more fully than anything which I could write—was to the effect that he had looked into the box, in which the paper and pencils, &c., were kept, in order to ascertain that there was plenty of paper there, if required. As this appears to have been the only precaution which he took, or thought it necessary to take, we need not perhaps further consider the validity of this test. (3) On one occasion, when all the occupants of the house were assembled at the séance, and when ingress of any unauthorised person was presumably impossible, Mr. Theobald tells us ("LIGHT," p. 246) that they received a message to the effect that various writings would be found on the ceilings, &c., of the upper rooms. On leaving the séance room the writings were actually found as predicted. Of course, it is conceivable that, in most cases, the writings had been on the ceilings for some time before the séance, but had escaped detection. Mr. Theobald, however, assures us, that this "could not have been the case in at least one instance, because I had five minutes before (sc.: the séance) looked at my study ceiling to see if there was any more writing than a solitary B, which was written as a beginning three weeks ago; and I know there was none then." Well, I must admit that when Mr. Theobald first described this occurrence to me, it seemed to me extremely remarkable, and I went down to Blackheath prepared, and almost expecting, to find definite proof of some extra-physical agency in the matter. As Mr. Theobald described it to me vide voce, and as he has described it in "LIGHT," it is obviously implied that the additional writing was in such a position that anyone casually looking up at the "solitary B" must necessarily see the other writing as well. Clearly, if there was any likelihood, or even any remote possibility, of such an observer overlooking the additional writing, the test is valueless, for the additional writing might have been made weeks before. Well, when we came to Blackheath, Mr. Hughes and I found the "solitary B" in Mr. Theobald's study without any difficulty; it is a large, clearly formed letter, and is placed about the middle of the ceiling, near the gaselier. The additional writing, however, though we knew it to be there, we failed to detect until it was pointed out to us. It is much smaller, and is written on the cornice, at a distance of some feet from the gaseifier, where comparatively little light falls upon it, and where, by reason of the dirtiness of the background, it is by no means clearly distinguishable. It is not impossible that a person casually looking at the B should have failed, as we failed, to detect other writing. On the contrary, it is extremely unlikely that, unless he had made deliberate and careful search, he would have discovered this writing at all.

And I venture to think that an observer who had spent the time and pains needed to make such a search conclusive would have described the process in some other words than those used by Mr. Theobald. "I looked at my study ceiling to see if there were any more writing than a solitary B."

I have discussed the question of the production of the writings in preference to dealing with the other matters recounted by Mr. Theobald, not from a malicious desire to attack the weakest part of a strong case, but because it appeared to me the only portion of the evidence which presented any prima facie proof at all of abnormal agency. I must own that, as the facts were described by Mr. Theobald, it seemed not easy to account for the production of some of these writings by normal means; and I went down to Blackheath somewhat impressed with the strength of the evidence on this score. Well, I found, as I have recounted, that its seeming strength was due to an almost incredibly vague and inaccurate representation of the actual circumstances.

It did not seem to me then, and it does not seem to me now, that there are, even on Mr. Theobald's own statement, any grounds for ascribing the rest of the phenomena to other than normal causes. Mr. Theobald, as he tells us, watched often in the hope of seeing the fire lit by unseen hands; but, to quote his own words: "What I watched for I failed to obtain, but I received proof to my mind of presence outside our own. This kind of reply to my watching has been frequent; I seldom get exactly what I seek, but something equally satisfactory in the way of proof." (p. 241.) I have no reason to doubt that these "equally satisfactory proofs" have been correctly described in the pages of "LIGHT," and the reader is, therefore, as competent as Mr. Theobald or myself to judge of their value. Two such "proofs" are given at the end of p. 244. Another, which I will briefly summarise here, will be found on p. 245:—Mr. Theobald had asked for a message to be written on some MS., locked up in the secretaire; the test given was the writing of a message on a separate piece of paper, subsequently introduced into the secretaire, and found in the position which I have already described.

To conclude. It may be that there is a royal road to knowledge; and Mr. Theobald may have discovered it. It may be, in other words, that there are other faculties for the apprehension of truth than the senses and the intellect which we know. Mr. Theobald's conviction of the extra-physical origin of these phenomena may be based upon the intuition of some higher and more spiritual faculty, and may possess irrefragable certainty. But certainty so acquired cannot readily be communicated to others. If Mr. Theobald had been content to appeal to faith, he would have run no risk of being put to confusion; but he would have found, it is likely, not many disciples. He has, however, not done this. He has appealed to faculties which are the common property of all men—to the senses and to the understanding; by the evidence of the senses, therefore, and under the laws of the understanding must his cause be tried. And the verdict of that tribunal will, I think, be adverse to his claims. He has observed and reported many strange occurrences, and has adduced evidence on which he has founded very startling conclusions. But these occurrences have appeared strange only because the observation has been inaccurate or the report erroneous and misleading. And the conclusions are ill-founded in the exact measure in which the evidence is misrepresented. Amongst much, however, that he has failed to establish, one set of facts is, in my judgment at least, conclusively proved. On the evidence adduced there is little room for doubt that certain occurrences did take place as described. Fires, we may believe, were lit, kettles filled, and breakfast tables laid. But phenomena such as these are known to occur in other domestic circles, and Mr. Theobald has established no grounds which would warrant us in attributing them, in his case, to other than familiar domestic agencies.

I entirely agree with the account Mr. Podmore has given of our personal investigation of the phenomena which have taken place at Mr. Theobald's house.

February 14th, 1885.

[Fully believing that the interests of truth are best served by free discussion, we have given Mr. Podmore an opportunity of stating his case. It will be seen that he throws a very thin disguise indeed over the conclusions at which he has arrived. Bearing in mind the serious nature of the inferences drawn by him, it is only fair to Mr. Theobald to announce here that he has informed us he has no intention of shirking the issues raised, and that he has "a very conclusive answer." Nothing more can be said this week except that Mr. Theobald contends that Mr. Podmore's investigation of this matter is manifestly of the most superficial character, inasmuch as the time he devoted to it did not exceed one hour. But we must leave Mr. Theobald to tell his own story.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

A Reply to Mr. Eubule-Evans.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The relevancy of my letter referring to that of Mr. Eubule-Evans, in your paper of 31st January, and of his reply to mine, may be judged by the following extracts from his first letter:—"We are inundated with Spiritualistic literature, which would be all very interesting, if we could just get our little modicum of fact to start with. But whenever I have hungrily asked for a fact, I have been given—a dark séance," &c. "If Mr. Eglinton can really command an occult force, it is a thousand pities that the fact is not, once for all, scientifically demonstrated."

The whole implication of that letter was that scientific verification of these facts is wanting. I wrote to dispute that assumption, and not to deal with a particular question which could only have the importance it possesses for Mr. Eubule-Evans if that assumption were allowed to pass. I am unconscious of any "controversial device" in my letter, which is also quite innocent of any irrelevant personality. In the latter respect, indeed, Mr. Eubule-Evans has the advantage of me; because I do not know the quality of his metaphysics, whereas in my own attempts to represent philosophical speculations—very rarely original—he finds far-fetched material for a sneer, which, coming from a critic of whose competence I had any assurance, might possibly annoy.

By omitting part of a sentence of mine which he (thus imperfectly) quotes, and by assuming that the word "less" means "not at all," Mr. Eubule-Evans is able to suggest that I think the Society for Psychical Research would be usefully occupied in co-ordinating facts which it has taken "no pains" to verify.

What I said was: "It has always seemed to me that the really useful work of the Society is less the verification of bare facts," &c. From my own point of view, it would be highly illogical to regard the most needful and important function of the Society to be the re-demonstration of facts which I believe to be already sufficiently proved. The statement of this view Mr. Eubule-Evans considers not ad rem; since his question referred to a professed object of the Society, not to individual opinions of its best utility. But there was a logical necessity upon me, after what I had already said, to justify my own connection with the Society, and otherwise Mr. Eubule-Evans might, and probably would, have retorted: "Why then do you belong to it?"

I had no authority to reply on behalf of the Society, and certainly did not affect to do so. Mr. Evans, though approving its methods and results, has not, I believe, supported it by his name and subscription. He prefers criticism of its progress in "LIGHT" to the direct influence he might exercise as a member. And as an independent correspondent in that paper, I am no more guilty of evading a question which would be more properly addressed by a member of the Society to its governing body, than I am concerned with the "phenomenal Greek" defended (if it is defended) by another contributor with whom Mr. Evans associates me in a pointless sarcasm.

It is not my fault if he is unable to see that his letter implied either ignorance of, or dissatisfaction with, all the existing testimony of distinguished scientific observers of these phenomena, and that it was open to any of your readers, including myself, to maintain the sufficiency of such evidence, without justly incurring the reproach of illogical or disingenuous evasion of a question, somewhat peremptorily asked by a gentleman who had not put himself in a position to ask it, and in a quarter in which no official reply was to be expected. Had Mr. Eubule-Evans avoided generalities, his question might, for me, have taken its chance of any irresponsible answer it could get.

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I beg to say, in response to Mr. A. Eubule-Evans's inquiry, that I do not decline to be investigated by the Society for Psychical Research, or any society having for its object the elucidation of truth. Indeed, and I believe it is no secret, I have sat with many of the most prominent members of that Society, with what results only those who have had the experience can say.—Yours truly,

The Relations of Religion and Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I hope you will give me space for a reply to Mr. Donaldson's letter, in which he attacks one of the objects I have most closely at heart, viz.: the leaving undisturbed the relations between Religion and Spiritualism.

First, let me deny emphatically that it is for any social reason that I deprecate any division between them; it is because I see clearly that in union is their strength, and that disruption must bring injury to both. Mr. Donaldson writes well on Spiritualism because he has gone into the subject somewhat deeply, but when he touches on religion he seems to have merely skimmed the surface. Human theology, like everything else that is human, is a curious compound of good and evil; the clouded and perverse human intellect takes hold of the precious truths which are placed before it, and in order to suit them to its liking or capacity, twists and turns them till they are scarcely recognisable; but beneath all the surface error that is thus thrown up, lies sacred truth for those who will go deep enough to find it. This is true equally of religion and Spiritualism.

All this is perfectly well known to readers of "LIGHT," and any one who should mix up esoteric and exoteric Buddhism, or esoteric and exoteric Spiritualism, would be put out of court; but the difference between esoteric and exoteric Christianity is quite as great, and where any comparison is made, should be fairly considered. As far as I have observed, the rule hitherto with writers of Mr. Donaldson's turn of mind has been to compare exoteric Christianity with esoteric Spiritualism, and the result is a perversion of truth. It is a curious confirmation of what I say that anyone who could write the first half of Mr. Donaldson's letter, full as it is of thought and insight, should yet be unable to see deeper than the human incrustations which overlie the popular theology, and fail to perceive that true religion and Spiritualism are twin sisters. He can see, in other matters, the inadequacy of the outward and phenomenal to express the inward and real, yet he refuses to apply this truth to religion. What would become of Spiritualism if it were judged only by the low and puerile manifestations which are some of its outcomes? He can realise our embryonic condition and the difficulties of communication between beings of various degrees of development, and yet he will not have patience with his fellow embryo, who is, maybe, a little less developed (on some points) than himself. Unconsciously, he is falling back into the old narrow selfish spirit which has marred all reformations in the past, which says to those whom it ought to help: "I am right, ye are wrong, shift ye for yourselves." Seriously, do we wish to form ourselves into a small protesting sect, bristling with objections against all who cannot yet see as we do, or are we to go out into all the world with hands of healing, leavening the whole mass? Surely, we do not wish to hide up our talents in a napkin for ourselves alone, but, as we have freely received, desire freely to spread our good tidings among all men. The only way to do this is to seek out, not points of difference, but of agreement with those whom we wish to convince; for, as Mr. Donaldson very rightly shows, there must be a common standpoint of mental perception before information can be conveyed.

Again, I deny that the Church of the present day is in a state of stagnation. To take only the last twenty years, which covers the space of my personal observation. When one considers the marvellous strides that liberal and loving thought has made in that short time, it is impossible to doubt that the Spirit of God is working actively in its midst. Take, e.g., the terrible doctrine of eternal punishment, to doubt which, twenty years ago, entailed a sort of ex-communication; this subject is now occupying the thoughts of religious men of all denominations, and larger and larger views are being calmly propounded and accepted. Thus, by a wholesome and natural process of digestion, the evil is being slowly but surely eliminated. Up to the present time, we Spiritualists have enjoyed the privilege of being the most catholic body that has yet existed for the seeking and propounding of truth, and herein has been our strength; let us think many times before we lose that privilege. There is room among us for minds of all shapes and sizes: let us welcome them all.

Yet one more word. There may be some to whom the Church has no message, "for God fulfils Himself in many ways"; but those who are able to receive Spiritualism as confirmed by religion, and religion as illumined by Spiritualism benefit doubly, and I would that all might so benefit. To illustrate my meaning may I be pardoned the egoism of relating some personal experience? When I was a young investigator in Spiritualism, a lady whom I consulted lent me the "New Basis."* I also borrowed "The Two Worlds,"† and then my eyes were opened to what had lain before them all along, but had never been appreciated, the unbroken chain of spiritual communication from the beginning of the world; and I avowed myself a Spiritualist; which I should probably never have done but for the testimony contained in the Sacred Writings which have been preserved for us by the Church. A few months after this, we discovered, to our surprise, that three-fourths of our family were media, and then, as high and holy teaching came pouring in among us, new and ever new and clear light was shed, not only on the Bible, but the Prayer-book, and we read as with eyes from which scales had fallen, and are still falling. As I look back upon my past life, I see how all the training I received from Church teaching, from my earliest years, was fitting and preparing me for that which I am now able to receive, and which again is doubtless paving the way for more to come. To me, therefore, Spiritualism would have but shallow basis without religion; religion, but half its life without Spiritualism; and, knowing as I do, the blessed effects of their union in our own circle, is it to be marvelled at if I long that all around us should be equally blessed?—I am, sir, yours faithfully

A. E. MAJOR.

MR. W. EGLINTON'S CONTINENTAL TRIP.—Mr. Eglinton leaves London on Sunday evening next for Paris, where he will stay for a few days with some friends. His address in that city will be 35, Rue de Berne. He afterwards proceeds for a lengthened stay to Vienna, where we believe he has arranged to give sances to the very people who behaved so shamefully during Mr. Bastian's visit to that city. It is not Mr. Eglinton's intention to make a long stay abroad, owing to pressing matters requiring his attention at home. Letters addressed to the Grand Hotel, Vienna, will reach him.

HENRY WARD BEECHER ON WITCHCRAFT AND SPIRITUALISM.

Perhaps no preacher of the 80,000 in the United States is more proficient in the art of standing on both sides of the fence at the same time than Henry Ward Beecher. In fact, such is his dexterity, he hoodwinks the spectators so that they are equally divided in opinion in regard to which side he is on. Whenever he has come out squarely and made a distinct declaration, usually in the next sermon he has taken pains to deny it, thus reminding one of the excellent cow that gave the pail of milk and then kicked it over. He went out of his way in a recent sermon to deny his belief in Spiritualism, by preaching against witchcraft. Of course, the Witch of Endor was his text, and he came to these conclusions:—

"Now, as to this matter of witchcraft—women witches, men wizards—I know just as much as you do and you know just as much as I do, and we both know nothing. Certainly, at the time the narrative of Saul's visit was written, it was believed to be merely a historical fact. This belief in witchcraft has permeated men's minds in all ages. Even as late as two hundred years ago it was believed in by everybody—doctors, lawyers, ministers, philosophers—and during the two hundred years which preceded that time over half a million of men had been burned to death in Europe after judicial trial and conviction of participation in the black art. What has become of that belief? Science struck it no sledge-hammer blows which drove it away; no arguments which ever were framed against it had the least effect. It was never disproved, and yet where has it gone? No one knows, and no one knows why it has gone; but it has cleared up and floated away and become no more, even as a fog rises and disappears before the rays of the morning sun. Still we have the old belief in witchcraft among a few of our people lingering yet, while in place of it we have a new kind of communication with the spirit world. I mean by Spiritualists. Now in regard to this question: Do spirits ever revisit this earth? I want to say that I would be happy to believe they did, but I have failed to discover it. The communications I have received purporting to be from my parents were of such a weak, milk-and-watery nature that they ought to have been put in an infirmary. I have been at séances perhaps a dozen times in the course of my life, and have seen many things I could not understand, but nothing to convince me that communication with a spirit world is open to us."

If Mr. Beecher knows "nothing about witchcraft," why does he essay to talk about it, as though he was thoroughly versed, and well prepared to come to such sweeping conclusions? He confesses he knows "nothing," except that the belief has gone, how or why he does not know!

There is one thing Mr. Beecher knows and every Bible student knows, namely, that the existence of witchcraft and witches is most clearly affirmed by that book. It makes no statement more absolutely; and on its command not to suffer a witch to live, rests the most damning atrocities of the past ages, finally ending in this country in the terrors of the Salem persecution. Mr. Beecher says: "Science" had no blows for it! Science is certain knowledge, and just this, and this alone, has awakened mankind from the nightmare of dogmatism which made such wholesale torture possible.

Granting his version of witchcraft, going "to the Witch of Endor to traffic with the devil,"—"to the powers of darkness for help," there could be nothing more unjust than referring Spiritualism to the same source. As for spirits revisiting this earth, he would be "happy to believe they did," but he has "failed to discover it"! What does Mr. Beecher think of his Bible? He denies the truth of its doctrine of witchcraft, and says that it is all blown to limbo, and now he discards all its teachings in regard to immortal life! Yet the Book is replete from beginning to end with the ministrations of spirits. Its value depends thereon, as a fundamental evidence of life after death. An angel appears to Hagar and to Jacob; an angel spoke to all the peoples of Bochim; Gideon saw an angel on an oak, and received therefrom the announcement of his mission to save Israel; the Witch of Endor saw "gods" or spirits ascending from the earth; Elijah was fed by an angel; an angel appeared to David with a drawn sword; an angel appeared to Daniel amid the flames in company with the three holy children, and again appeared clothed in linen, &c.; an angel came to Joseph in a dream; Moses and Elias appeared to Jesus and then others; an angel appeared to the two Marias at the sepulchre, and a spirit removed the stone from the door; an angel appeared to Zacharias in the temple; an angel appeared to Mary and announced the birth of Jesus; angels appeared to the shepherds; Mary Magdalene saw two spirits dressed in white, who addressed her; angels opened the prison doors and liberated the Apostles; an angel came and spoke to Cornelius; Paul saw a "man," or spirit, praying him to "come over to Macedonia and help us"; and Revelation is a series of angelic visions.

From the time of the Apostles to the present there is an unbroken chain of evidence of the appearance of angels or spirits.

What does Mr. Beecher propose to do with this mass of Biblical evidence, or rather what has he done with it, that he would be so "happy" to be "convinced" that "spirits never revisit the earth"?

His brothers have been convinced of the truth of spirit-intercourse. Charles Beecher has written a book on the subject, in which on Biblical grounds he supports his belief in the same. His sisters have arrived at the same conclusion. Mrs. Stowe gladly accepts it, and Mrs. Hooker is an ardent advocate. The Beecher family are a family of Spiritualists, and it is passing strange that while other members receive satisfactory communications from their spirit friends, to Henry Ward alone they give instructions "of such a weak, milk-and-watery nature that they ought to be put in an infirmary."

We presume that Spiritualists will readily understand why he receives such "milk-and-water" communications. At one time Mr. Beecher inclined to Spiritualism, and his sermons were for a time replete with its philosophy. He will find, as others have done, that it were better to consult even a "Witch of Endor," than curry popular favour by denouncing what he knows to be true.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

We are desired to remind the members and friends of the London Spiritualist Alliance of the conversation which will be held on Thursday evening next, February 26th, at seven p.m., in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall. Miss Rosamond Dale Owen will address the meeting. We hope to see a large attendance. Tickets can be obtained in accordance with the announcement in another column.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XVII.

The Journal of Science says: "It remains to be seen whether Spiritualism will henceforth take up a political character"—since Mr. Gladstone had some observation of psychography. We might as well expect that the fact of Mr. Gladstone turning over a boulder would convert geologists to Liberal views, or his policy in Egypt.

The same journal says that certain scientific journals are "coquetting with Spiritualism"—whatever that may mean—and predicts that "they will probably soon change sides, eat their own words, and display the usual indiscreet zeal of neophytes." We wish them joy of the process of eating their own words, and a good digestion.

We are also informed "that the mere possibility of a fourth dimension of space is a serious consideration"—because a four dimensional being could enter our rooms, our prisons, our locked chests, and do all the things commonly done by the spirits. A ghost is only a fellow with an additional dimension.

Mr. F. W. Myers, a newspaper tells us, explains certain phenomena supposed to be spiritualistic as the unconscious reading by one person of the unconscious thoughts of another. But what explanation is this of physical manifestations? Slate-writing, for example. Here is the fact: I lay my hands upon two clean slates with a crumb of pencil between them. I hear the sound of writing. On removing one slate from the other, I find a page of writing in a familiar hand, relating facts or answering questions unknown to any person but myself. Thought-reading does not explain the mechanical operation, which is a stupendous physical fact, which Lord Tennyson and Mr. Gladstone have observed, but have not attempted to explain.

Truth invites Mr. Damiani to give Scotland-yard the benefit of some spiritual communications respecting the dynamiters. Spirits, as a rule, do not meddle with gambling or police. They do not serve military commanders as spies; nor furnish wronged husbands with evidence for the Divorce Courts. If they were to mix in our affairs in any of these ways, we should have a nice time of it. If spirits were as indiscreet as ordinary men and women in the flesh, life would be intolerable.

A correspondent of Truth—"What's in a name?" asks Juliet—writes that the ladies at a Psychical Research meeting "seemed to be in that semi-dazed state which is half-way between hysteria and lunacy," and the men "more or less in the same condition as the weaker vessels." Then, why weaker? "The only celebrity present was Oscar Wilde"—as if that would account for the condition alike of the men and women. If there are men capable of writing such stuff to newspapers, we must still wonder that there are editors stupid enough to print it.

What are our anti-Spiritualist friends thinking about in this matter of the iron ring worn by Mr. Husk as a wristlet, and examined by an inquirer to find out how it got there? It could not go over his hand—and there it was and had been for several days. Only a white heat could weld it, and how could that have been applied to a close-fitting ring on a man's wrist?

It is well to repeat the facts and to consider the problem. It is not new. Iron rings have been worn similarly as necklaces. Zöllner's ring turned from solid wood, and placed where it still remains upon the pillar of a table, is another proof of the miraculous power of spirits over matter.

Professor Huxley got the largest vote as Man of Science in the Pall Mall Gazette competition; and what has this scientific leader to say about solid iron wristlets and necklaces, which are put on and taken off as if they were made of indiarubber?

What they all say with one accord is (a) it is not true, and (b) if any credible person says it is true, he has been deceived by a bit of conjuring, and that which is physically impossible is not to be believed upon any kind or amount of testimony. Still there is the fact—one of thousands just as impossible—just as opposed to the "well-known laws of nature."

What is the materialisation of a visible, palpable, human form, that walks about, talks with you, shakes hands, gets photographed, and so on, but a far more complex and wonderful exhibition of the same power of mind over matter—if we only knew, or could begin to know what is mind, and what is matter, and the relations of one to the other?

Really, as I may have remarked on some former occasion, we seem to have been placed in this world expressly to see and wonder—but not to know the why or how of anything, and least of all of ourselves. And of all hypotheses that of materialism is the most incredible. "With God all things are possible." This is not the assertion that God is Almighty. That is what God means. The assertion is—Admit the existence of a God, and all phenomena are easily accounted for—the sole difficulty being to account for God.

Chinese Gordon—Gordon of the Soudan—believed in God, and had no difficulties about matter or spirit. The Salvation Army has none. Naturalists have their kind of miracles, such as the formation of a cluster of leaves, while packed in a little capsule, or the formation of a bird from a microscopic point in an egg. The phenomena of nature are a little less rapid than those of Spiritualism, but the production of an ear of wheat—say, from its germ, when you look at it, is quite as wonderful as an ordinary materialisation with Mr. Eglinton.

Tyndall and Huxley—or vice versa, with Professor Lankester thrown in—know no more of one phenomenon than of the other. "Ernest" and "Joey" are as real, as solid, as visible, tangible, audible, thoughtful, and strong in mind and muscle as any of our naturalists. Only they have two or three powers or faculties denied to the eminent professors, and desired by them. "Ernest" comes to me in a perfectly closed room, the door locked, and the key in my pocket, and window safely barred. He writes between two slates firmly held or tied together. He writes in a little closed box, with my hands upon the cover. A big musical box, resting on my knees, with my hands on its lid, at my request stops in the middle of a tune, goes on, plays fast, plays slow—contrary to the well-known laws of mechanics. "Ernest" talks with me, shakes hands, says good night, and, while the door is firmly locked, and the window firmly barred, is no longer visible or tangible.

As if the materialisation of the body, animated by a human spirit, with powers far beyond those of any man in his natural body, were not a miracle immensely transcending Mr. Husk's iron wristlet! But the beautiful simplicity of the latter is its charm. We begin with A B C and $2 + 2 = 4$. Some seem to stop there—or thereabouts.

The spirit "Lily" whom many of my readers have seen, conversed with, perhaps felt as well as seen, was strong enough, with favouring conditions, to hold her materialised form together so as to be photographed by daylight. She was nice about her costume, and very graceful in a long robe of white drapery floating to the ground. One day I was indiscreet enough to ask her if she had any shoes and stockings. We were on rather familiar terms. "Come here," she said, "and I will show you." Of course I gladly accepted the invitation. "Now hold your hand near the floor, and I will put my foot in it." I dropped—gracefully, of course—on one knee and held my right hand, palm upward, three inches from the carpet. Into it came a very nice little naked foot—solving the problem as to shoes and stockings. I carefully and discreetly examined its anatomy. It was a perfectly natural naked feminine foot. Within the curtains which formed the "cabinet" was the medium, Miss Cook. There was plenty of light to make the rest of our company visible. The only question was whether Miss Cook was "Lily" and "Lily" Miss Cook—and this was quickly solved. Withdrawing her naked foot from my hand, "Lily" said, "Now, examine my medium!" I reached out my hand, and found the two feet of Miss Cook, who was sitting in a chair, seemingly in a deep trance, completely enclosed in a pair of twelve button boots!

Every investigator who seeks the simple truth in a philosophical spirit, with no theory to support, and ready to accept every fact that comes to him, inevitably becomes a Spiritualist; that is, he becomes satisfied of the genuineness—the objective reality—of the phenomena. The why and how he can meditate upon at his leisure. The facts, facts, facts are the first consideration.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal has published a remarkable lecture by Professor J. R. Buchanan, one of the most original of American investigators and thinkers. Two of his mottoes are: "I am a man, and consider nothing foreign which concerns humanity;" and "The scientific method is to examine facts."

Dr. Buchanan, like many other practical scientists, has little respect for the metaphysicians who so pertinaciously contradict each other, and not seldom themselves. For example, he says:—"Kant could not understand Spinoza and declared Fichte's system untenable. Schopenhauer repudiates Kant. Mill says Hamilton adhered to no statement that he had adopted. Berkeley said, 'We metaphysicians rain a dust and then complain that we cannot see.' Plato taught that there was no matter, only ideas, the thinker being as unreal as all of which he thought—an ideal man making an ideal universe. Aristotle's logic was an intellectual calamity for the human race. He was an imbecile speculator, feeble in reasoning, and careless as to his facts; and not one of the whole school of metaphysicians, from Plato to Hamilton, ever had a glimmering perception of what philosophy means."

Dr. Buchanan's conclusion is that which we are trying to illustrate and enforce—that "the most important facts ever displayed on earth are those which prove to us that the dead return, organise matter, and demonstrate the reality of their continued existence, giving us thereby, a solid, reasonable hope of immortality."

"Magna est Veritas"—only it is very slow if very sure. Possession is said to be nine points of the law, the tenth having small chance against them. This is true of the prejudices of education. We have to unroot an old belief before we can plant a new one, and by a natural reaction superstition causes infidelity.

The religious faith—the popular theology—of the Middle Ages, led to the most horrible persecutions; the general belief in the power of demons and its exercise in witchcraft caused the hanging, drowning, and burning of innumerable old women, even so recent and so wise a judge as Sir Matthew Hale having sentenced numbers to death!

The reaction from these horrors caused the present materialism, and the sturdy, and sometimes stupid, resistance to the truth or reality of Spiritualism as scientifically demonstrated by the observation of facts—which show also the probability that the witches put to death two centuries ago, in obedience to the command given to Moses, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," were, in many cases, mediums of mischievous human spirits.

The amelioration of our morals, manners, and laws is shown in many ways. A medium to-day is seldom prosecuted, and when he is, seldom gets more than three months of a mild imprisonment. A libeller, with friends and money, gets four months of somewhat luxurious repose as a first-class misdemeanant. A century ago it would have been the whipping-post, nailing by the ear, the branding iron, or the pillory.

So the world really moves. The creed persecuted to-day becomes the dominant, and perhaps, persecuting faith of to-morrow—but freedom comes with knowledge, and free thought must lead in time to its free expression. In the twentieth century people in what are called civilised countries will not even be ridiculed for trying to know the truth—even about Spiritualism. That is my present Outlook.

W. T. R.—Although good and very suitable for private perusal by those who understand the method of its genesis, the message is hardly fit for the columns of "LIGHT." Remember the old proverb about "casting pearls."

AMERICA is certainly ahead of Europe in the path of progress. The three colleges of Boston, New York, and Cincinnati, have obtained official authority for establishing a special course in magnetic therapeutics and for giving diplomas. Already individuals known as having the gift of healing have received such diplomas.—Le Spiritisme.

THE AMERICAN SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION.

A copy of the report of the American Spiritualist Association's annual meeting, held at Lake Pleasant Camp last August, has been forwarded to us. It is published in the form of a pamphlet of twenty-four octavo pages, at the office of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, Chicago. It contains the Association's declaration of principles and constitution, with list of officers; also the speeches, in full, of the President and of prominent Spiritualists present on the important occasion. It then gives the President's subsequent address to Spiritualists at large, on the urgent need for organisation; and his pleading is made more forcible by the reproduction of an address by Dr. S. B. Brittan, published in 1878, quite as apposite now as it was at that time.

Under the heading of "A Bond of Union" the communication received from the London Spiritualist Alliance by the Association is reported, with the resolutions passed thereupon by the Executive Board of the Association. These resolutions express concurrence in the conviction that, in the proposed alliance, "no assent to any fixed creed or confession of faith is required," and in the propositions "(1) That there is a life coincident with, and independent of, the life of the body; (2) That, as a necessary corollary, this life extends beyond the life of the body; and (3) That, under favouring conditions, there can be communication between the denizens of that state of existence and those of the world in which we now live." Further (4), "The American Spiritualist Association will co-operate with the London Spiritualist Alliance in opposing the materialism of the age."

The President, in his address, calls to mind that all the officers of the Association freely give time and money to the cause, and the only source of income being members' dollar subscriptions, voluntary contributions will be looked for from those who can afford them to give effective aid in the work of the Association.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Several letters stand over this week. We hope to give them due attention in our next issue.

READERS OF "LIGHT" will do us a great service if they will kindly write out, in a concise form, an account of facts that may come under their notice, giving, if possible, the full names and addresses of all concerned.

THE "THEOSOPHIST."—Vol. I. of this magazine has been reprinted, and a few sets are now in the hands of the Psychological Press. Persons desirous of completing their files should make an early application to the manager.

OUR advertisement columns this week contain an announcement of the Cripples' Home for Children, on the committee of which are some names well known in Spiritualist circles. We hope shortly to be able to find an opportunity of visiting the institution and of giving a report in these columns.

MADAME COULOMB.—An advertisement appears in another column of a pamphlet issued by Madame Coulomb, giving an account of her "intercourse with Madame Blavatsky from 1872 to 1884." In justice to the last-named lady, weak and inconclusive as we thought her case, that of Madame Coulomb is far more unsatisfactory. It becomes increasingly difficult to arrive at the truth of the matter, especially as, according to the Pioneer of India, Madame Blavatsky has now, in spite of her definite assurance to the contrary previous to leaving England, decided not to prosecute Madame Coulomb for slander.

BOOKS RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.—"Sympneumatrea," by Laurence Oliphant; "Two Stories of the Unseen: The Open Door, and Old Lady Mary," by Mrs. Oliphant; "The Mother; or, the Woman Clothed with the Sun;" "Songs of the Heights and Depths," by the Hon. Roden Noel; "Man; or, Fragments of Forgotten History," by Two Chelms of the Theosophical Society; "Spirits in Prison," by Professor Plumptre; "Homes and Work in the Future Life," by F. J. Theobald; "Back to the Father's House; Shadows," by John Wetherbee; "How to Live a Century and Grow Old Gracefully," by J. M. Peebles, M.D.

"POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY"—AN UN-SCIENTIFIC SPIRIT.

Professor Elliott Coues, whose treatise on Biogen—or a spiritual basis of life—we have commended, falls under the displeasure and contempt of the Popular Science Monthly, whose materialistic methods are transcended by this large-souled and able scientist. A physical basis of life, a protoplasmic start from slime and mud, suits the proud Monthly, but a spiritual basis of life it despises. Last August it mentioned Professor Coues's Biogen as "a lively little treatise on biological mysticisms, . . . a spree in speculation, . . . a rally for the defence of the old, but declining doctrine of 'vital force,' which was 'made the most of in times of ignorance,'" and contemptuously closes by saying that "the publishers, doubtless aware of the fitness of things, have printed it in mediæval type, such as was used in the dark ages to which Biogen belongs."

In the same number some comments of the Saturday Review on mesmerism are approvingly quoted, in which it is thought that a small margin of hypnotic facts may be real, but "the common element of mesmerism and Spiritualism, indeed a very large one, is really delusion and fraud alone." We are also told that investigation "by those alone qualified to report," has "over and over negated all shadow of evidence" that mesmeric subjects can do anything, or see anything, or "be influenced to perform specific actions" without previous hints or impressions. The wise writer, and the equally wise Science Monthly, have never heard of Dr. Gregory's experiment in Scotland, where a "learned professor" went into another room and soon the mesmerised subject of Dr. Gregory began to laugh and told what odd capers the man who just went out was cutting in another room, describing perfectly an odd dance he was performing, and of which none knew but himself. Many like facts could be given, but the Science Monthly sneers at them. "None so blind as those that won't see" is a good old proverb.

Is it the true scientific spirit to fling contempt on honest and skilled students who may differ from us? Do true scientists ignore facts and flout at conclusions from premises of which they are ignorant? That is the spirit of this unscientific magazine. But it may be said that it gives us much valuable matter, which we have no wish to deny and would not underrate.

Some of the old Romish Popes were valuable and liberal patrons of art, but they were Popes. The blind and bigoted contempt of this Monthly for any spiritual science or philosophy is as bitter and dogmatic as the papal horror of heretics. A bigot is a bigot, be he professor or priest, devotee of Rome or of inductive science.

Professor Coues may well count the contempt of the Popular Science Monthly as high honour. Let him possess his soul in patience and work and wait, and the honour at last will be his, the shame and confusion theirs.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

MR. W. EGLINTON is now paying a short visit to Ulverston, where he is giving sances to the local clergymen and others interested in Spiritualism. We shall hope to give an account of them in an early issue.

HAUNTING.—A house in Crown-street, Newhaven, Conn., is inhabited by a Mr. Mann and his wife. A servant who slept in an attic said that her bedstead had been pushed about at night; and that a woollen dress, which she had placed on her table, was in the morning in a state of ash. When the Manns have been alone in the house, they have heard noises as of feet moving about and of things falling. Mr. Ross, an employé of Adams' Express Company, occupied the premises, with his wife, previously. He says they were similarly disturbed, and that Mrs. Ross's nurse declared that she saw going up and down stairs, they having no lodger, a tall man in ordinary costume, with a face of ashy paleness. Many think that the house has been the scene of some tragedy, and hope that an investigation may lead to the laying of the uncanny spiritual visitant.—New York Herald.

TRANSMISSION OF THOUGHT.

(EXTRACTED FROM Le Spiritisme.)

M. Richet, the eminent physiologist, is the editor of the Revue Scientifique. He has contributed an article to the Revue Philosophique, in which he relates experiments made to test the possibility of transmitting thought without the use of signs by speech, gesture, or writing.

Drs. Charcot and Dumontpallier have already published their experiments on the same subject, as have also before them some men of science in England, all confirmatory of the fact—so long known to, and published by, the students of magnetism.

M. Richet took for his starting-point the fact demonstrated by mathematicians, that a man guessing one of a pack of playing-cards—fifty-two in number—and then drawing one haphazard, his guessing will be right ten times in a hundred.

Sitting at a table with a common pack of playing cards, remote from another table at which sat his medium, he drew one, and having well looked at it, willed his medium to guess what it was, and the medium guessed right. He drew again and again. The medium's guessing was not always right; but it exceeded the mathematician's ten in a hundred. M. Richet was satisfied that the excess was due to the operation of some natural force.

He made another experiment:—At a table, connected with an electric ringing apparatus and a needle suspended horizontally over a quadrant marked with the letters of the alphabet, he placed three persons, one his medium. The slightest motion of the medium was communicated to the table, the bells sounded, and the needle moved. At another remote table the experimenter sat with an alphabet before him. He touched letter after letter, forming a word or simple sentence, willing their transmission to the medium, who often stirred, causing the bell to ring and the needle to point, but not always with exact correspondence to the experimenter's will, rendering, for example, Louim for Louis, and Jeen for Jean. M. Richet was satisfied by this result also, and announces his intention to continue the investigation, promising to comment in a subsequent article upon the investigations of certain English savants.

It is very refreshing to find an eminent physiologist, editor of a scientific journal, engaging in the study of phenomena still under the scientific ban of charlatanism. We may now look forward with hope to the time when our savants will have acquired the good sense to withhold from denying facts without investigation, and from contending against ideas solely because they are new. How often are they to be reminded of the discovery of the circulation of the blood, and that its most resolute opponents were in our colleges of medicine?

SAINT-HEREM.

CUMBERLAND ON THE CONTINENT.—Le Messager (Liège) reports the Cumberland-Labouchere challenge and Mr. Eglington's reply, which it calls reasonable and dignified. It then gives Signor Damiani's counter challenge to Mr. Labouchere, and promises to report further proceedings. Le Messager says that Mr. Labouchere's partner in the challenge is now in Brussels giving his usual entertainment, at the admission prices of 20 francs and 10 francs. Le Spiritisme (Paris) also reports the challenges: it says, "This Cumberland evaded test sances offered by us when he was in Paris, and he evaded a similar offer by the Spiritualist Society of Vienna." It then reports the doings of Bellini in Brussels, who advertises himself as "le prestidigitateur anti-spiritiste, pas charlatan comme Cumberland—the anti-Spiritist prestidigitator, not a charlatan like Cumberland"—promising to explain Spiritist tricks! Le Spiritisme then quotes from the Chronique (Brussels), "He made some experiments in magnetism and thought-reading, then some with the Davenport cabinet; then he extricated himself from a sealed sack; but of explanation not a word, to the great dissatisfaction of many of the audience, who said they had been blagués—humbugged, and they were right."

ORTHODOXY IN RUSSIA.

(From the Russian Correspondence in the Revue Spirite.)

In Russia religious opinions are various and of every shade. The State Church, calling itself Orthodox, is the sect of the Greek Church, which separated from the original Catholic, or Universal Christian Church, of which the Roman Pontiff claims to be the head.

In Russian society all religious opinions are treated with tolerance, especially since the introduction of Spiritualism. This tolerance, however, has not yet penetrated the ranks of the Orthodox clergy; on the contrary, Spiritualism seems to have excited greater clerical intolerance, and the State under its potent influence tightens the reins of secular power in its favour. This deplorable intolerance extends to all religious sects outside of its own pale. The United Greek communion, for example, which has been an object of persecution for half-a-century, has now its churches confiscated and their members put under police supervision to prevent their attending the worship of any other than the Orthodox.

It is impossible to specify its treatment to minor sects, so numerous in Russia. It vents its lamentable feeling signally against members of the Roman Catholic communion. Here are some of the instances quoted:—

A Roman Catholic may not leave his property according to his discretion; it devolves compulsorily as the law directs.

In the case of mixed marriages, if either parent is Orthodox, all the children must be brought up Orthodox; if a Roman Catholic or other priest baptises such, he subjects himself to transportation.

No church, except the Orthodox, may make any religious demonstration whatever outside of its own walls.

No Roman Catholic bishop may make a diocesan visitation without a permit from the governor of the province; nor may a Roman Catholic priest visit a sick or dying person beyond the bounds of his proper parish.

No Roman Catholic priest may confess an Orthodox Russian, under pain of transportation.

The impediments hedging all not within the pale of the Orthodox Church are numerous and vexatious. Take one instance: A general officer, a Protestant, whose wife is a Catholic, applied for a permit to buy a small estate in one of the provinces, and it was refused, on the ground of their not being Orthodox.

It is a grave matter to offend the Church, for such is its influence that it may end in transportation, which means the long, terrible march to Siberia.

But, as said before, religious opinion is not held to be a cause of difference in society, and remarkably so in the capital since the introduction of Spiritualism.

DISORDERLY MANIFESTATIONS.—At a farm-house at Montélimart, occupied by Mouton-Florent, his wife, and a daughter ten years of age, for the past four weeks there have been stones thrown through the windows and doorways. The place has been put under the protection of the police in vain. Lately things have been thrown about within the house and crockery broken. The little girl speaks of seeing one "Marianne," invisible to others, and also an old man. Her description of the latter corresponds with that of her grandfather, deceased before she was born. She says they both ask for alms.—Revue Spirite.

GLASGOW.—Mrs. E. W. Wallis occupied the platform on Sunday last at the Spiritualists' Hall, 2, Carlton-place. The subject chosen by her guides was, "Popular objections to Spiritualism considered and confuted," to which they addressed themselves with their habitual earnestness and vigour. The audience was not so large as it probably would have been but for a counter-attraction in the form of an address under the auspices of the Glasgow Sunday Society, by the Hon. Roden Noel, in St. Andrew's Hall (the largest meeting-place in the city). His subject was "Byron," the chair being taken by Professor Nichol, of Glasgow University. Naturally, a number of Spiritualists went to hear the distinguished stranger, who has been brave enough to say what he knows or thinks in favour of the unpopular subject of Spiritualism.

A CURIOUS APPARITION.

By H. WEDGWOOD.

The following narrative of an experience which she had when a young girl, was given me by a lady, a German by birth, but married to an English clergyman, and now the very successful principal of an advanced institution for young ladies. I first heard it from her by word of mouth in the autumn; and three months afterwards she sent me, at my request, the written statement exactly to the same effect.

"I am afraid it will sound absurd," she says; "and yet even now I have the whole scene as clearly before me as it was then, and I could give an exact drawing of the shape of those white legs. There certainly was no body to them." The occurrence took place, I suppose, about twenty years ago.

I was staying with my mother during the winter months with a Countess W., at Krippitz, near Strehlen [in Silesia?]. To get to the usual sitting-room one had to pass a large reception room, and on the right, near the entrance, stood a large handsome stove, before which was a screen, usually covered up with a kind of silk gauze, and every time a person passed the screen the draught would make it rustle. One night all the family had gone to a ball at Strehlen, so my mother and I were left alone, with an old man servant to wait on us at our evening meal. My mother was resting in her room, and I had gone into the sitting-room to try some new songs which a friend of our Countess had lent for me. One of them was a very sad one.

"Will she come when I am in my grave and put a wreath upon it, &c. Will she come?"

Just at that moment I heard distinctly a hollow knocking at the door which led into the large reception room. I started and cried, "Come in!" thinking it was Friedrich coming to tell me that dinner was ready. But another similar knock was heard, and thinking that dear old Friedrich wanted to frighten me a bit, I took the candle and went to the door, ready to fling it open and show that I was prepared for the joke. When I stood there another louder and more resonant knock sounded right in my ear and made me shiver. I opened the door sharply and stood there with my candle, gazing into the room. I saw nothing, but heard the rustling of the silk gauze as if someone unseen glided by. I heard that gliding or floating sound all through the room, and even in the adjacent corridor and down the stairs. I went at once into the kitchen and asked the maids if some one had come up stairs, but the question was superfluous; they were all in the kitchen, Friedrich with his big apron polishing up the silver, and telling me that he would serve up shortly. Then I went to our room, and told my mother what had happened, and it felt so lonely and horrible in those large rooms that we determined to have our dinner in our own room. Yet it felt as if we were not alone, and we had to look round to see if no one else was there.

Shortly afterwards I was with the Countess in the same room, between light and dark. I was playing on the piano, while she walked up and down the room. She came to me several times, asking me if I did not hear voices; she always heard voices either talking or shouting into her ear. I told her I heard nothing, and went on playing. I just then played the Carnival de Venise, arranged by Schmetthoff, and when I came to the last page, and just finished off with the run, I heard a horrible harsh voice shout into my ear, "Allerliebste!" (charming!) and, with a start, I looked round, and saw sliding behind the wardrobe in the Count's dressing-room a pair of white, thin legs cut off above the knees. The legs were wound round with white linen stuff, and the feet had no shape at all. They ended in a long, thin boot-shape, as one sees in pictures of the time of Chaucer. The linen was twisted all round, and about the knees it was thicker looking. I had fully time to see that, as they glided slowly behind the wardrobe. They looked as if they had come fresh out of the grave.

As soon as I had heard that horrible voice the Countess put her hand on my shoulder, and, in a very frightened voice, said, "Now, tell me, did you not hear any voices, now? Why do you look so frightened? Is there anything in the dressing-room?" I did not want to frighten her more, so I got up, and said I would just look in the dressing-room, I thought I heard somebody calling. So I looked cautiously all round, and when I came to the wardrobe I found that it was pushed close up to the wall, although when I saw the legs sliding behind it, it looked as if it stood two or three inches off, as I could see distinctly a space between the wardrobe and the wall. I came back and told the Countess I must have been mistaken about some one calling as no one was to be seen. I sat down once more and played one of those beautiful hymn tunes which always seemed to soothe the Countess, and whenever I did so she said that the voices did not disturb her so much.

One evening we had all been very merry and my mother told some anecdotes, and finally ordered me off to bed at 9.30, as usual. I went rather reluctantly, as I never liked to be alone till she came. However, I went, and when I looked for the matches to light the candle it seemed as if a whole electric battery had got loose. It cracked with electricity all over the room, and when my candle was lit it was just as if some one unseen was making fun of me. First it cracked close by my ear, then near the writing table at the foot of the bed, then again close to my ear, once in my right, and once in my left ear. So I determined to fetch my mother, and let her hear the electric battery, and when I went to the door it was worse than before. When my mother came just a few sounds were heard close to her ear and then all was quiet. It felt like the calmness after a storm.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates medianimic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE CREDULITY OF SCEPTICISM.

BY MORELL THEOBALD.

A REJOINDER TO MR. PODMORE'S CRITICISMS ON "SPIRITUALISM AT HOME."

Before entering in detail into Mr. Podmore's criticisms on the phenomena which I have reported, there are one or two very important preliminary considerations. Mr. Podmore writes in a severely judicial, quasi-scientific style. He claims to be the representative of a society for careful and dispassionate inquiry into these matters; as such he has made his investigations, and as such he presents his report. If so, I submit that he should have given the full particulars of the process of his inquiry: the date when it was made; the number of visits he paid; and the time those visits occupied. If the Society deputed him he will of course have presented his report to the committee: let us hear how the committee received it. Mr. Podmore poses not as an individual; he wears a livery, bears a staff; and therefore claims for his communication an importance which individually it certainly does not deserve. Now I have a little right to complain of this, because I find that no official recognition of his inquiry exists, and he certainly did not present himself in that capacity when he visited me. If I had supposed I was being subjected to the solemn and judicial process of a trial before this excellent Society, my attitude would have been different, and my former reply to Mr. Podmore would have been modified in important respects. Moreover, the reception which I would have given him would have been more guarded, and I would have postponed the inquiry, de die in diem, till all matters sub judice had been fully discussed. As a matter of fact, Mr. Podmore's visit was not of this serious character: we were very free and easy together, not at all judicial. He only visited me once—he has not, so far as I know, made any experiments to give body or force to his speculations as to the mode in which the phenomena were produced. I certainly did not provide him with a broomstick, with or without pencil attached; he made no attempt to write in a style similar to that on the papers or ceilings which he looked at, but he certainly did jump on to a chair in the hall, and found that he could not reach the ceiling by any extension of his very long arms! All his suggested explanations are of the ex post facto order, and quite different from what we have been accustomed to in the accredited investigations of the Society which is supposed to decorate him with its credentials.

I pass by, for the present, Mr. Podmore's criticisms on questions of identity, and of mis-spelling in Greek or other messages. These are fair questions for argument and for differences of opinion, and I shall deal with them in my own way and at my own convenience. But questions of fact—that is of the fact whether the phenomena of daily occurrence in my house are normal or abnormal in their character, are the result of some occult power or are produced by fraud—brook no delay. For these are really the issues raised by Mr. Podmore's communication in the last number of "LIGHT." True, he suggests another hypothesis—"that the fires were lit, the poetry written, and the kettles filled, by some person in a state akin to somnambulism"! But this absurd suggestion even Mr. Podmore himself is keen enough to see will not apply, and so he not only seeks to show that I am deceived but delicately hints that, by the way in which I have "described the process," I have been a party to the fraud. Whether the suggested disingenuousness has been on my part or on the part of Mr. Podmore your readers will be able to judge.

Speaking first of the "character" of the writing, he mentions that I had in "LIGHT," p. 205, referred to this "as utterly out of the range of ordinary human writing." And I submit that in doing so I was perfectly correct. Certainly I have never seen sheets of ordinary human writing so minute, so neat, and so regular; and I do not know anybody who has. If Mr. Podmore knows of such, let him produce them. Mr. Podmore admits that the writing "is remarkably regular and even, and unusually small; but," he adds, "I saw no specimen which was not perfectly legible to the naked eye, and which could not be equalled in minuteness and clearness by most educated persons without any very severe exercise of patience." I suppose Mr. Podmore would class himself amongst "educated persons." Well, I challenge him—in the presence of a committee, who shall watch the process—to copy a sheet of this writing, equalling it "in minuteness and clearness without any severe exercise of patience." I venture to say that it will take him more time and the exercise of a great deal more patience than any member of my household has a chance of devoting to an act of fraud, and that even then he will fail. The writing is so minute that most persons to whom I have shown it have been able to read but two or three lines without great weariness to the eyes, and if they cared to finish it have been glad to avail themselves of a powerful magnifying glass, which I keep for the purpose. So much for the dependence to be placed on Mr. Podmore's accuracy. I will show the writings to any who may be curious to see them if they will call at my house for the purpose on Saturday afternoon next, or any other day by appointment, so that they may have an opportunity of judging for themselves.

As to the writing on the ceilings, Mr. Podmore states that "that on the ceilings of the rooms is, in every case, large and straggling in curious contrast to the tiny and well-formed writing on the paper." His object in stating this is manifestly to suggest that it is thus large and straggling, because of the difficulty of reaching it, whereas if it were done by an occult power that power would be able to execute "well-formed writing" on the ceiling as well as on paper within easy reach. To this I might reply that any power, physical or spiritual, writing on the ceiling, some way out of the range of ordinary vision, would, one would naturally suppose, write "large and straggling" so that the writing might be more easily be seen. Mr. Podmore's statement would, therefore, amount to nothing if it were in accordance with the facts—but it is not. We have writing on the ceiling of one of the rooms, small and regular, and strikingly characteristic of the departed friend by whom it professes to have been given. So from imperfect knowledge Mr. Podmore hastily and eagerly draws false conclusions.

Again—eager to make his preconceived theories fit—Mr. Podmore says: "There are, however, two or three sentences on the ceiling in the hall, and above the lintel of the door, which are regularly and evenly written, and in a much smaller handwriting. Now, it is noteworthy that the inscribed portion of the ceiling in the hall, and the wall above the door, would be within the reach of a person of ordinary stature, standing upon a chair."

Before a man, careful to be on the side of truth wherever it might lead him, made this assertion, he would have measured the height of this ceiling. I have done so. It is 9ft. 4in. Needless to say, it is not "within the reach of a person of ordinary stature standing upon a chair." Yet, Mr. Podmore, unmindful of this fact, admits that these sentences are "regularly and evenly written, and in a much smaller handwriting"! If so, who wrote them? And this is the man who has the modesty to say of the occurrences which I have from time to time described that they have "appeared strange only because the observation has been inaccurate or the report erroneous and misleading"! After this what is to be thought of his own observation and report? Verily, Mr. Podmore is a puzzle!

In another case Mr. Podmore endeavours to make a good deal out of a very little. I had stated that I was told at one of our sances that some writing would be found on the ceiling of my study, at which I had looked five minutes before and found that there was then nothing but a solitary B written three weeks before; but on leaving the séance-room I went to my study and found the writing as I had been told. When Mr. Podmore came down he discovered the solitary B in the centre of the ceiling without difficulty whereas he failed to detect the additional writing until it was pointed out to him, it being much smaller and written not on, but near, the cornice; and he thence argues that it might have been done weeks before and been overlooked. My reply is that it had not been done weeks before, and had not been overlooked. I know that it was not there when I looked, and I know it because my search was thorough. I have had, during very many months, too much experience in discovering writing in most unlikely places to be stupid enough to search without finding.

Mr. Podmore further says: "With reference to one message of considerable length, which purported to have been written"—within the cabinet—"in an abnormally brief period, we asked Mr. Theobald whether he had examined the paper on which the message was written before the séance began. His reply—and it is noteworthy, as illustrating his attitude towards the occurrence more fully than anything which I could write—was to the effect that he had looked into the box, in which the paper and pencils, &c., were kept, in order to ascertain that there was plenty of paper there, if required. As this appears to have been the only precaution which he took, or thought it necessary to take, we need not perhaps further consider the validity of this test."

Just so. It does not seem to suit Mr. Podmore to consider the validity of any test very far. But it was not the only precaution which I took. The paper in the box had already been secretly marked, as it always is. Indeed, I have sometimes handed in a sheet of marked paper to the cabinet, and had the same sheet returned to me a minute or two afterwards with messages in the same very minute and regular handwriting already referred to, written, moreover, on ruled paper, the lines of which were perfectly kept. If Mr. Podmore thinks that this was accomplished in the dark, by an uneducated young woman, and not by abnormal means, he is certainly an instance of the utter "credulity of scepticism," or our medium, who certainly could not do the work in the light, is abnormally clever in the darkness of the recess.

I come now to what Mr. Podmore, in his "capacity as a member of the Society for Psychical Research," evidently prides himself upon as the discovery of a crucial test. He says: "Mr. Theobald showed Mr. Hughes and myself the piece of furniture in question," a private secretaire, "having a substantial wooden flap of considerable thickness, and, apparently, a lock of good construction. Mr. Theobald also indicated the precise spot on which he had found one of the written messages referred to. When he had again closed and locked the secretaire, Mr. Hughes, in his presence and mine, pushed half-a-sheet of note-paper through the crevice at the top of the flap, and by means of a second half-sheet gave it such impetus that it fell on almost the same spot as that already indicated as the locus of the 'spirit message.' This demonstration that the 'test' of the locked secretaire was worthless, occurred before the publication of the account in 'LIGHT,' June 14th, in which this 'test' is described without a hint of its real value."

Indeed! Why should I hint that the "test" had any value when I knew that it had not? Mr. Podmore's visit was in March. My letter, in which Mr. Podmore thinks I should have admitted the value of his test, was written in June. But in the mean time "many things had happened"! Mr. Hughes, in Mr. Podmore's presence, had pushed a half-sheet of thin note-paper through the crevice with difficulty, by giving it an impetus with another piece. But since then I had found messages there, written on paper which no artifice could have got through the crevice—notably one instance in which it was directly opposite the lock, and written on a thick sheet of paper trebly folded! And since then again, on my birthday (November 14th), I had found on my study table a short note telling me that a birthday-letter would be found in the secretaire, on opening which I discovered, directly opposite the lock, a sheet of paper filled with writing, folded in four, and enclosed in an envelope! Clearly Mr. Podmore has not the requisite capacity for psychical research. He jumps at conclusions too hastily.

The real animus of Mr. Podmore comes out in his concluding sentences, as follows: "Amongst much, however, that he has failed to establish, one set of facts is, in my judgment at least, conclusively proved. On the evidence adduced there is little room for doubt that certain occurrences did take place as described. Fires, we may believe, were lit, kettles filled, and breakfast tables laid. But phenomena such as these are known to occur in other domestic circles, and Mr. Theobald has established no grounds which would warrant us in attributing them, in his case, to other than familiar domestic agencies."

This is a clear charge of fraud. If Mr. Podmore means it to attach to myself or to any member of my family, then I throw the charge back upon him and tell him that we are at least as honest, and as sincere seekers after truth, as he can be. And if he means the charge for our domestic help, I reply that, knowing and esteeming her as we do, after many months of close observation—acquainted with all the acts of her every-day life, almost with her every thought—I can no more believe her to be capable of fraud than I can believe Mr. Podmore to be guilty of forgery. Yes,—in spite of the protestations of the so-called scientific mind—character does count for something in all matters, normal or abnormal, and I cannot, without protest, allow the character of a young woman, whose honour and integrity have been fully tested and established, to be thus ruthlessly sacrificed to the "credulity of scepticism."

Moreover, we have abundant evidence—and I say this for the satisfaction of those who do not know Mary as we do—that the phenomena alluded to are not due, as Mr. Podmore gratuitously assumes, to familiar domestic agencies. I do not care again to detail at length occurrences which I have already published. As to the particular incidents alluded to, they occur almost daily, as they have done for many months—often under the direct observance of some member of the family. I myself have once, and my wife and daughter have several times, seen the fire lighted, in the day time, "by other than familiar domestic agencies," and my daughter has seen heavy articles being carried about the house without human intervention. It may suit Mr. Podmore's mental temperament to say that "the thing is impossible." I reply, "Just so—only it happened, nevertheless!"

And even if Mary were morally capable of the fraud which Mr. Podmore so slipshodly and carelessly suggests, she has no opportunity of perpetrating it. I will record one solitary instance out of many. On one occasion, before going down to the séance-room where all the other members of the household had already assembled, I placed a sheet of blank paper on my study table and left it there. At the close of the séance I was the first to leave the room, and went straight up to my study, when I found that the paper which I had left blank upon the table had in the meantime been written upon, the first page being filled with writing. I cannot vouch for the whereabouts of the cat on that particular evening; out of which unfortunate circumstance Mr. Podmore may, by the exercise of his wonted ingenuity, succeed in evolving a working hypothesis either of fraud or of "natural causes."

Mary, it should also be stated, is never alone; my daughter assists her in her domestic duties, and even sleeps with her; and the two have quite enough to do to get through their work. She is not, moreover, one of those "educated persons" whom Mr. Podmore credits with such wonderful capacities. She could not—if her life depended on the fact—execute even a decent imitation of some of the many writings we have had, especially of the sheets of very minute writing already referred to. Since Mr. Podmore's visit we have had over 300 written messages—amongst them writings, in very various styles, in French, Latin, Greek, German, Raratongese, Welsh, and old Brittany to say nothing of some messages specially characteristic, and in the very style of departed friends of whom Mary could know nothing. Where could she, even if she had nothing else in the world to do, pick up all these matters? And how and when could she acquire all the requisite information about our departed friends—departed years before we knew her—learn their peculiar characteristics, practise the forgery of their handwritings, and carefully write out lengthy messages, some of which would task even the patience of one of Mr. Podmore's imaginary educated persons to copy? Were she intellectually capable of doing a tithe of this she could only do it by slipping out of bed in the dead of the night, leaving her bed-companion asleep and unconscious of the fact. Mr. Podmore suggests that the writings on the lofty ceilings might be done by pencils fastened to the ends of broomsticks! A friend at my side as I write this suggests "fiddlesticks!"; but I will not hurt Mr. Podmore's feelings by a joke when he is evidently so serious. Mr. Podmore clearly believes that he could write a respectable hand on a ceiling in that way; I would advise him to try. But even this could only be done by Mary, as I have said, in the dead of the night! And fancy Mary at midnight, unmissed by her companion, wandering over the house in her night-dress, a candle in one hand and a broomstick in the other, amusing herself in inscribing messages on the ceilings! If Mr. Podmore can really believe all this I think I am fully justified in heading this communication "The Credulity of Scepticism!"

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XVIII.

I hold that no one can do a better service to Spiritualism than he who exposes a fraud, or shows how any phenomenon, supposed to be spiritual, could be naturally produced. I should be extremely obliged to any one, for example, who would tell me how a common chair has been threaded on my arm, while I held the hand of Mr. Eglington; how writing was done in a well-known hand, between two slates, which I held out at arm's-length in the light between my thumb and fingers; how a drawing, which would take a clever artist an hour to make, was done in utter darkness on my marked paper, in my hearing, in less than a minute—and a dozen or two of similar "miracles."

Of course, it is open to any critic to reject my testimony, and that of half-a-dozen witnesses competent to prove any ordinary fact; but by such a process everything unusual or improbable could be discredited. It may be said—it is more likely that a hundred persons should tell a motiveless lie, than that a spirit, that is, an invisible, intelligent being, should be able to manifest its existence by what are called spiritual phenomena. But a preconceived theory as to what is possible is unphilosophical. Out of mathematics, anything may happen. Matthew Arnold says miracles don't happen because he has never happened to see one. Every Spiritualist knows that "miracles" do happen, because he has seen them.

Of course, at this present writing, I have not seen the reply of Mr. Theobald to the criticisms of Mr. Podmore, but believing him to be honest and not idiotic—neither a knave nor a fool—I am not in the least disposed to question his testimony, nor object to have it ever so carefully examined. The more such things are sifted the better. I should be glad, for example, to have Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle, as solid, hard-headed, matter-of-fact man as I know, put into the witness-box and cross-examined. What we want is a trial in which the facts of Spiritualism can be judicially examined, or a scientific commission, which would settle the question. We might get up an amicable libel suit, for example, in the Law Courts, if it were not too costly. Or the Royal Society might be induced to appoint a Special Committee.

Or, which may be the best plan of all, we may allow the spirits themselves to manage their own affairs, as they have done and are doing all over the world. For example, an indiscretion of a very remarkable medium, some years ago, brought into a London Court of Law a body of testimony such as had never before been gathered. There it is on record in sworn affidavits, ready for use. In a more recent criminal trial the judge saw fit to exclude all testimony as to the facts of Spiritualism, on the ground that they would have no weight with him, and ought not to have any with the jury, though sworn to by a thousand witnesses.

Mrs. Groom seems to have given some very nice tests at Liverpool. A gentleman held that her descriptions of spirits were thought-reading, that she only described the departed persons of whom he was thinking. To remove that objection she proceeded to describe some of whom he confessed he was not thinking, and thus disposed of his theory. Within the limits of her powers or gifts, this lady has always seemed to me a very satisfactory and useful medium.

One of our "contemporaries" has found a remarkably big mare's nest. In a theological discourse, he says: "We are warned against the domain of sensuality intruding upon the spiritual realm,"—domains are always intruding upon realms,—it is a way they have got—"as it has done in our case, to its great reproach; but the most notorious scandal that has taken place among us has been the work of Papists, who, under the guise of being the servants of Spiritualism, have endeavoured to be its worst foes." And as if this dreadful news were not bad enough, we have a prophecy thrown in. "We may look for an increase of this treachery in the future."

The Pope, it seems, is a much more dangerous personage than the Mahdi. Happily we have a Spiritualist Gordon—or Wolseley, perhaps, who means to "smash" him. At all events, our contemporary means, at every cost, to reprove both the Pope and the bad mediums. This is clear enough, for he says—"Balaam, who was reproved by his ass, is a type of the unprincipled medium, who is ready to do any kind of dirty service for hire"—only I cannot quite see what Balaam can have to do with the Pope, or the Pope with Balaam; but there is no mistaking the ass.

From the same source we get another proof of the wisdom of the Transatlantic bard who has warned us against making predictions before we know. "A Sensitive," speaking of the Mahdi, and of General Gordon, before the fact of the death of the latter was known, says:—"He (the Mahdi) is far too subtle not to be well able to judge of the power that opposes him, and if there is one thing more desirable, it is the life of the noble prisoner in his hands; for he knows his worth in changing foes into friends." Now, when Balaam made this indiscreet proclamation, where was his ass? The thistles must have been uncommonly thick.

I cannot see why Popery should be denounced by Spiritualists, any more than any other of the hundred and odd creeds of Christendom. It is older than most and perhaps as logical as some. The history of the Catholic Church, and the lives of the saints, even the coldest and most carefully edited, are full of spiritual manifestations. That a priest, bishop, or even a cardinal should denounce, and warn his flock against any Spiritualism outside the Church, is not a matter of wonder. The strange thing is that we hear so little of it. But priests are like the virgins we read about. Take any ten, and you may probably find that if five are wise, the other five are foolish, and have no oil in their lamps.

As Spiritualists we need not trouble ourselves in the least about Roman Catholics. They are necessarily Spiritualists. Their literature is full of miraculous manifestations. It is only when their faith fails, and they are in danger of lapsing into Materialism, that they need new evidences of spirit existence. Our mission is to Protestants and Infidels. It is to prove to all who doubt or deny a future life that it is a demonstrable fact, an unquestionable certainty, an absolute reality.

The two young men who shut themselves in a compartment of an express train out at Vienna, the other day, and then blew out their brains with their pistols, solved the problem for themselves, no doubt. But would they have enacted such a tragedy had they known the facts of Spiritualism? In ninety-nine cases in one hundred, our coroners' juries bring in a verdict of temporary insanity—but how in this Vienna case, which may have been a mutual murder? However they managed it, there is not much doubt that they were a couple of pessimistic Materialists, who finding life not worth living, resolved to get out of it, and were disappointed, perhaps sorry, when they awoke to consciousness on the other side.

Mr. Eglinton has gone to Vienna. It is said that he has been invited by Baron Hellenbach, and that he may show to Prince Rudolph, and the Archduke Johan, the slate-writing that so deeply interested Mr. Gladstone, Surgeon-General Wolseley, and Lord Tennyson. When the Austrian Prince and Archduke have had a short course of psychography, they may be ready for materialisations. Even princes must creep before they walk, and have to learn their A B C's before they can read. It is very sad that there is not a Royal road to learning and wisdom, nor even to good manners; but so it is! Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt, it is said, was obliged to give even an English Royal personage a lesson. Exercising in her presence the Royal prerogative of wearing his hat, while her other admirers were uncovered, she exercised her higher prerogative, as a lady, to put all upon an equality, by saying, as she alone could have said it, "Conterez-vous, messieurs!" (Tableau!)

Mr. Eglinton, I venture to predict, will not have any rope pulled, nor door slammed, nor be seized, nor have his person searched and his pockets rifled in Vienna, where in the other case nothing was found, after all the searching—nothing in the least to account for a series of varied materialisations.

The influence of men is not confined to the circle of their acquaintance. It spreads on every side of them, like the undulations of the smitten water, and will reach those whom they never saw.

THE CURRENT NUMBER OF "LIGHT."

According to our usual practice, we are not printing copies in excess of the actual demand. In view, however, of the remarkable evidence for "materialisation" presented this week, our subscribers may desire to circulate "LIGHT" amongst their friends interested in Spiritualism. We have, therefore, arranged to keep the type standing until Monday next; and, provided a total of 2,000 extra copies are ordered, applications for parcels of "LIGHT" for free distribution at the rate of 2s. 6d. for every twenty-five copies (postage 6d.) will be filed. All orders must reach us not later than the first post on Monday morning, March 1st. We shall be pleased to circulate any copies entrusted to our care.

THE CHROMO PLATES.

These will be issued with "LIGHT" of March 7th, and will be sent to subscribers on our own list and also to those who, obtaining their supplies through Mr. Allen or any other source, made the requisite application previous to January 31st last. When published, a few copies will be on sale at the rate of 2s. the set of four plates.

We regret the delay, but this has proved unavoidable. Work of this kind requires great care, and when it came to be "proved" it was found that two or more tint stones were necessary. The total cost of the gift will considerably exceed £50 for stones, drawing and printing. There are four plates (1) A series of "spirit" lights. (2) A "spirit" hand enveloped in drapery, showing how the latter appears in process of formation. (3) A microscopic hand. (4) An "apparition" (bust).

Those who have paid for special packing (6d.) for parcel post will receive them on rollers. This is the only safe method of transit; folded and posted in the ordinary way they will be spoilt. We mention this to afford subscribers an opportunity of having the plates specially packed if they wish, especially as, being in every sense of the word "works of art," it seems a pity to thus damage them.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION AT CAVENDISH ROOMS.

We gladly comply with the request to insert the following announcements. The services are conducted by Mr. James Burns, of the Medium and Daybreak.

In celebration of the 37th anniversary of the Advent of Modern Spiritualism, it is proposed to hold a friendly reunion of London Spiritualists, at Cavendish Rooms, 51, Mortimer-street, on Wednesday evening, March 18th. There will be a tea from 6.30 till 7.30, after which the evening will be spent in speeches from well-known friends of the cause, suitable to the occasion, interspersed with music and singing.

It is intended that this meeting be helpful to the New Series of Sunday Evening Services, which have been so successfully inaugurated at Cavendish Rooms. The effort to carry on these meetings with the assistance of local mediums and speakers, and at a minimum expense, promises to be a gratifying success. There are, however, valuable workers at a distance, who would gladly visit us on payment of their expenses if we had a fund for that purpose.

That the proceeds of this Anniversary Celebration may go wholly to the fund for sustaining the Sunday Services, the expenses are being contributed by kind friends of the cause. Your aid in this work is respectfully solicited, and will be thankfully received by MRS. MALTEY, 45, Grove-road, St. John's Wood.

MRS. BURNS, 15, Southampton Row.

MR. H. G. ATKINSON.—We regret to learn that Mr. Atkinson passed away on the 28th December last at Boulogne-sur-Mer. He had long been a contributor to the various spiritual journals.

We are informed that Mr. Eglinton has given most successful sances to people of the highest society in Paris, including M. Tisot and M. Dettaille, the great painters, also M. Richet and M. Ribot, the eminent scientists. He has left Paris for Vienna, and letters addressed to the Grand Hotel in that city will find him.

"The Ring Test, a Proof of the Reality of a Materialisation."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In July last I attended a séance with Mr. Husk, when, whilst taking our seats around the table, it was noticed that a thick, but narrow ring was on his left wrist. He had not informed us of the fact, because, having become somewhat accustomed to wearing "bracelets," he said he did not himself remember the circumstance.

The ring was carefully examined by all present and found to be the identical test-ring used by "Irresistible" in the "matter through matter" experiment. In order to show the evidential value of the materialisation test, I must first give a somewhat detailed description of this ring. The internal circumference is 7.95 inches (being a trifle wider than Dr. Wyld's ring, No. 1). It can be moved up the arm—which is rather thin—exactly five inches above the wrist-bone. It is of rather coarse make, plainly welded, and was manufactured by a sceptical inquirer for the purpose of experiment. Hundreds of investigators have examined this ring in their own hands before the beginning of the séance, and as many have found it over the medium's hand immediately after the gas had been relighted; yet there is no doubt as to its perfect solidity; and it is equally certain that it cannot possibly pass over a hand the circumference of which is 9.15 inches; nor can it be urged upwards more than 5½ inches.

Now, at the séance of July 6th, a form (bust) appeared over the table, and as a test exposed his nude left arm as far back as the elbow, showing by the light of a luminous slate that no ring was on it. We were all certain there was a ring on the medium's arm before and even during the séance, as it could be heard at intervals striking against the table. Just before the form (or bust) appeared, it so happened that the medium's arms became violently agitated, the shaking of his hands causing the ring to rattle against the woodwork, not only in a manner audible to those sitting around the table, but sufficiently loud to be heard in the next room. Nor was the nude spirit-arm exhibited in such a way as to make a careful examination difficult; for it was first announced by the spirit that the test would be given. All present being prepared for the event, were carefully watching the slow removal of the drapery. The uncovered fore-arm was placed upon the sheet of luminous paper twelve inches long, and kept in that position for at least twenty seconds. The illuminative power of the paper, which besides being nearly new, had been exposed to a long day's sunshine, was very good that evening. At the conclusion of the séance we all found the identical test ring on the medium's left arm.

Dr. Wyld's rings which I have seen on Mr. Husk's wrist, the first some three weeks ago, the second last Sunday evening, are thinner than the medium's own test-ring, which would to the sceptical mind render the welding, whilst on the wrist, a greater possibility than would be the case with the thicker one. But to those who might perhaps entertain such absurd ideas I would simply suggest that they should settle the question by their having the operation performed upon themselves.

Miracles.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am sorry to find that I have not made my argument quite clear to "W. N." He says that, according to my view, "a miracle happens whenever I take up my pen from its position of rest on the table."

This is a totally incorrect version of my doctrine. I expressly defined a miracle to be the result of the intervention of some superhuman intelligence. Now, as there is nothing "superhuman" in "W. N.'s" use of his pen, I fail to see the relevance of his illustration. He has mixed up together my definitions of miracle and law, and misused the combination. I use the word "certain" in the sense of known, regular, and ascertainable.

"W. N." thinks that in the miracle cited by me, of a man walking on water with the assistance of angels, the water might be dispensed with as an element in the performance. Possibly, but if "W. N." should ever be required to help an infirm person incapable of walking alone, "W. N." would probably discover the ground to be a considerable advantage in conducting the operation. I have no doubt the angels referred to would find the water equally serviceable. How does "W. N.'s" argument gain anything by dispensing with the water? The incident of a man supernaturally carried through the air is surely as miraculous as being helped to walk on water.

The phrase "supernatural" qualifies and governs all my comments on miraculous intervention, and I, therefore, see little excuse for "W. N.'s" misapprehension of my meaning.

"W. N." says, "There is no room for miracle in a domain of law, and this domain is co-extensive with the universe." Precisely so; but he omits to notice that there are two universes—the material and the spiritual: where both meet there is the zone of miracles. There may be "confusion of thought" apparent in this discussion, but I fancy this confusion is not on my side. I hope your readers will not consider my explanation too elementary for the occasion.—Yours, &c.,

TRIDENT.

A Deserving Case.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—My object in writing to you is to ask the kind help of readers of "LIGHT" in a case I have just been investigating.

Mr. John H. Pollen, a young man and Spiritualist, has been out of employment for some time and is in great distress. He is well educated, can speak and correspond in the French and Dutch languages; does not mind what employment he is given; can do freehand drawing, and would be content with a small remuneration so as to enable him to live. Can anyone help him in that way? He can only take light work as he is not of a strong constitution.

Not being able to write personally to all friends who know me, I ask you to insert this letter in the next issue of your paper, soliciting contributions towards the support of J. H. Pollen until he can get into some employment. He is now entirely without means, and will feel grateful for any act of kindness or help given him.

May I beg the kind assistance of our numerous friends and Spiritualists in this case? I shall feel greatly obliged for any amount.—Yours sincerely,

Lilian Villa, Hendon, N.W.

(MRS.) M. A. EVERITT.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

GLASGOW.—The burden of last Sunday's labours at the Spiritualists' Hall here devolved wholly upon Mrs. Wallis, her husband meanwhile filling engagements elsewhere. At the morning séance her guides discoursed on "Mediumship, its Responsibilities and Dangers," and succeeded in imparting much sound advice and earnest counsel to those engaged in the effort to establish rapport with the spirit world. Having warned their hearers that the doors of mediumship once opened, must needs be well guarded by the sentinels of pure aspiration and goodly intent, the guides waxed eloquent as they proceeded to speak of the sacred offices of mediumship, and the claim the world had upon those who possessed the gift developed into usefulness. After the discourse, which, by the way, was delivered with wonderful ease, fluency, and grace, came "Meranibo," who may be described as Mrs. Wallis's spiritual "right hand supporter." His style being conversational, an opportunity was afforded for a general expression of thought and opinion, during which it was made known that the services of both Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, as well as of their spirit friends, were at the disposal of all who stood in need thereof for the purpose of assisting in the development of private circles. Then followed "Verna," who clairvoyantly described the spirit forms, whom she could perceive within the sympathetic sphere of many of the persons comprising the séance. The public meeting at 6.30 p.m. was addressed on the subject; "Salvation, Why, When and How?" After an invocation couched in language at once simple, impressive, and spiritually elevating, the guides of Mrs. Wallis delivered a most vigorous and successful discourse on this theme.—Next Sunday, Mr. E. W. Wallis: "Answers to written Questions; or, Matters pertaining to Spiritualism."—ST. MUNGO.

THE poet yearning after sympathy may at least enjoy one consolation—the thought that many kindred spirits, though unknown to him, know and love him and participate in his sentiments.

AN "APPARITION" FORMED IN FULL VIEW.

BY SEVERAL WITNESSES.

Psychic ... MR. W. EGLINTON.

By JOHN S. FARMER.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Through the generosity of a gentleman, well-known in commercial circles all over the globe, but who wishes to preserve an anonymity in this matter, I was, some three months ago, placed in a position to commence experimental research in connection with what is commonly known as "form manifestation," or "materialisation." I have long and persistently urged upon Spiritualists the necessity of regular and systematic investigation in these matters. Hitherto the evidence, with one or two notable exceptions, has been chiefly spasmodic in character; and important clues not having been followed up as they were presented, a perplexing incompleteness characterises much of the evidence brought forward in support of the most delicate, as well as the most wonderful, of the many phases of psychical phenomena. I am not unmindful of the close scrutiny and the rigid scientific methods brought to bear upon the subject in the past by such observers as Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, Professor Crookes, and others; but, since their inquiries, ten or a dozen years have elapsed, and, with the course of time, vast strides have been made not only in the character of the phenomena but also in regard to the methods adopted in their investigation. Therefore I believe myself to be well within the bounds of truth when I say that my own narrative, and those of my fellow-witnesses, contain valuable additions to our present stock of knowledge. This is more especially the case when we remember that, since the experiments conducted by Mr. Wallace and Professor Crookes, no regular course of study has been engaged in—even by Spiritualists, who, of all people, should have been the first to recognise its absolute necessity and paramount importance. It is needless to discuss the cause of this; many reasons are obvious. It is sufficient now to emphasise the fact that it is only by such regular and searching inquiry that we can hope to establish our phenomena upon a firm and unassailable basis.

Practical experiment has fully justified this position. Short as this series of séances has been, there has been obtained, in my view, an incomparable result. I by no means wish to infer that we have exhausted the question. Personally, I am inclined to the belief that our experience, remarkable though it is, has been confined to the mere threshold of the inquiry, and, although the course, the cost of which has been defrayed by the kind friend already referred to, will soon be ended, I hope others will be so interested in a complete investigation of these marvels, that a continuation of research will be possible and practicable.

A series of twelve séances were arranged for with Mr. W. Eglinton, now of 11, Langham-street, W. Of these, nine have been given to circles varying in number from nine to fourteen persons, exclusive of the psychic. We have taken into account, as a working hypothesis, the existence of an intelligent force external to the sensitive. Such a position has in no way militated against the full and free use of reason and common-sense; indeed my experience has been that, by this method, I have been enabled to establish a bond of sympathy between myself and the medium which has proved of inestimable value in the conduct of the inquiry, and I know my experience has by no means been singular. By this means it has been rendered possible for us to suggest crucial experiments, discuss perplexing features and incidents—in fact, in every way to speak fully and freely what has been in our minds, and to obtain sanction for the employment of such measures as seemed to be desirable in order to settle moot points.

Space forbids my entering into a discussion of all the details of the course of séances here and now. Suffice it to say (I speak for myself alone) I entered upon the inquiry in a frame of mind which I can only describe as one of suspension of judgment on some particulars, and a reasoning scepticism with regard to others, while on some points I was in a state of utter disbelief. Now, although I have by no means arrived at full conviction on all the questions at issue, the uniform and unvarying willingness of Mr. Eglinton to place every facility for investigation before us, and the patient, earnest co-operation of the "sentient forces" working through him, have removed many doubts, shaken my scepticism, and in some respects given me an absolute conviction.

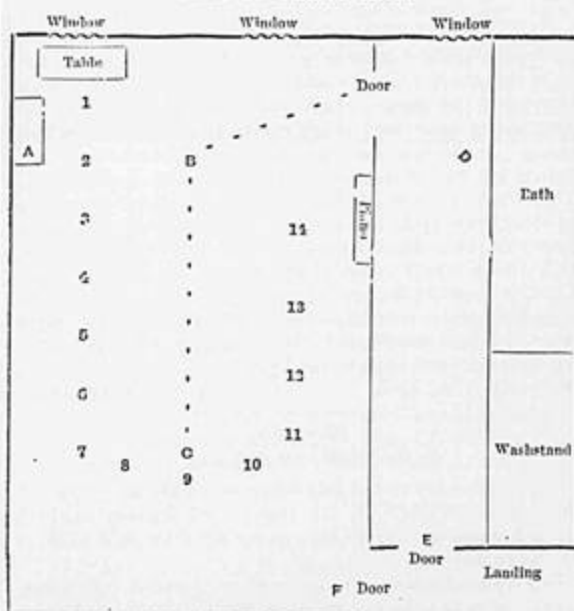

It is in regard to the latter that I desire to write now; other matters must be left for future treatment.

The ninth séance of the series took place on Tuesday evening, February 17th, at 11, Langham-street, W.

Plan of Seance Room, Constitution of the Circle, and Position of Observers.

Upon reference to the accompanying diagram it will be seen that the events described below do not depend upon illusive tests.

PLAN OF SEANCE ROOM.

Names and Positions of Members of the Circle:—

1. MRS. EVERITT, Lillian Villa, Holder's Hill, Hendon, N.W.
2. MR. E. DAWSON ROGERS, Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley, N.
3. MRS. HELEN WITTHALL, 5, Angell Park Gardens, Brixton, S.W.
4. MR. EVERITT, Lillian Villa, Holder's Hill, Hendon.
5. MR. H. WITTHALL, 5, Angell Park Gardens, Brixton, S.W.
6. MR. F. M. TAYLOR, 6, Finsbury Chambers, E.C.
7. MRS. FEARN, 23, Ledbury Road, W.
8. MR. D. YOUNGER, 23, Ledbury Road, W.
9. MRS. FARMER, Stoughton.
10. MRS. MANNING, 11, Langham Street, W.
11. MR. JOHN S. FARMER, 4, Ave Maria Lane, E.C.
12. MR. R. FRANK, Llanarth House, Holder's Hill, Hendon.
13. MRS. FRANK, Llanarth House, Holder's Hill, Hendon.
14. MRS. ROGERS, Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley, N.

The room is an ordinarily furnished sitting-room with doors leading on to a landing and into a bath-room, the latter also opening on the landing. The doors E and F I locked, securing that at E, leading from the bath-room to the passage, by pasting postage-stamp salvage from the jamb, across the marble shield covering the keyhole, to the panel of the door. To be doubly sure that while the circle was being held there was no possibility of communication by means of the bath-room door for a confederate without my knowledge, I made private marks on the door and door-post to indicate the exact position of the stamp-salvage, so that, assuming for a moment that it was removed to allow the ingress of a confederate, it is hardly possible it could have been replaced so exactly as to deceive subsequent scrutiny. I also examined the bath inside. The windows—the rooms are on the second floor—look out on to Langham-street; they are, therefore, duly accounted for.

These precautions are those we had, during our experiments, been in the habit of observing. Our experience on this particular evening, however, in no wise depended on these precautions.

The circle consisted of fourteen persons, exclusive of Mr. Eglinton. Their names and addresses are given above, and the figure opposite each name corresponds with the actual position occupied in the circle, as indicated by a corresponding numeral on the diagram. It will be found useful to bear in mind the position of the various witnesses when reading the evidence, which I hope will be added to my own description of what took place.

Across the door between seance-room and bath-room was hung two heavy curtains, and Mr. Eglinton, when using the bath-room as a cabinet, sat at, or near the spot marked D.

Amount of Light.

I have always found it difficult to describe the amount of light available for observation. Comparisons are unsatisfactory, and yet I know of no means by which the amount of light can be accurately gauged. On the present occasion I can only say that, though the gas burner at A was turned low, compared with the light actually used for lighting purposes in a small room, yet it was sufficient to enable me clearly to observe everybody and everything in the apartment. When the form that appeared walked to the spot at which I was sitting (No. 11) and stood before me, I was able distinctly to note every feature; indeed, were I to see the same face amidst the crowds of Regent-street, I should positively be able to identify it. Moreover, the night was a "light" one, and although a "long" blind was drawn down over the window at the back of No. 11 sitter, yet a considerable amount of light came from that source. After the séance I tested this by turning out the gas, and by this light alone I was able to distinguish the subjects of pictures on the walls, being, however, unable to read the titles of some of the engravings. It will thus be seen that although the light was technically "low," it was sufficient for the clear and accurate observation of what occurred.

The Process of Materialisation.

Passing by the preliminary occurrences on the evening in question as irrelevant to the phenomenon of the presentation of a form, evolved in presence of all the observers and with the psychic in the circle in full view the whole time, I will give my observations in detail. If my readers will note the position I occupied (No. 11) they will better understand my narrative.

Coming from the inner room, apparently in a state of deep trance, Mr. Eglinton paced up and down the space formed by the circle. He was restlessly spasmodic in his movements, and his hands, at times, convulsively clutched different parts of the upper portion of his body. Twice he paused, and, approaching Mr. Younger and Mr. Taylor, made passes over them. This parade lasted upwards of five minutes, during the last three of which a brilliant light—in size like a half-crown piece—was observed by me, at first on his right side only, but just previous to the next stage of the process, on his left side also, finally fluttering all over his breast. Upon the last turn these disappeared, and upon Mr. Eglinton taking up his position at the point indicated in the diagram at B they were not to be seen. All this time the breathing of the psychic had been increasingly laboured and deep, accompanied at times with groans.

Now, standing at B, half-sideways towards me, I saw him (Mr. Eglinton), by a quick movement of the fingers, gently draw, apparently from under his morning-coat, the top button of which was fastened, a dingy white looking substance, if I may so describe what I have never handled, and of the texture and make of which I have no knowledge. The movement of the fingers was such as to draw it at right angles from him, allowing it to fall and hang by its own weight down his left side. As it emerged from under his coat and fell, it gradually increased in volume until it reached the ground, covering Mr. Eglinton's left leg from the knee downwards, the connecting link between this portion and his side being preserved the whole time. The mass of white material on the ground increased in breadth, and now commenced to pulsate and move up and down, also swaying from side to side, the motor power being underneath the mass of material, and concealed from sight by it. The dimensions of the mass would be about two feet in height and, say, about three feet in length and breadth; but I was not favourably placed to observe the last two dimensions. Looking at the facts in the light of the result, I should say the upward pulsatory and the lateral swaying movements were caused by the action of the head of the "form" striking against the material resting on the floor. The height increased to three feet, and, shortly afterwards, the "form" quickly and quietly grew to its full height, carrying the above-mentioned dingy white material with it. This, by a quick movement of the hand, Mr. Eglinton drew off the head of the "form," the stuff itself falling back over the shoulders and forming part of the dress of our visitor, it being in some way firmly fixed to the rest of his apparel. All this time the link (of the same white appearance as already described) was maintained between the growing "form" and Mr. Eglinton, who had remained in sight of all of us during the whole operation. The connecting link was either now completely severed, or became so attenuated as to be invisible, and the "form," with a majesty and dignity one can ill describe, advanced to Mr. Everitt (No. 4), shook hands with him, and passed round the circle, treating nearly every one in the same manner. From my position I had an opportunity for prolonged and careful scrutiny. Upon his shaking hands with me, I, somewhat loth to lose my grasp, greeted him in this way three times. Passing on to Mr. and Mrs. Pearce (Nos. 12 and 13) and Mrs. Rogers (No. 14), he crossed the room to where Mr. Rogers (No. 2) was sitting, shook hands with him and those sitting on either side, and then, stepping out into the room, neared the curtains of the bath-room door, re-approached the medium, who was now partially supported from falling by Mr. Rogers, and, taking the psychic firmly by the shoulders, dragged him into the cabinet.

This is an accurate account of what I observed of the actual formation and disappearance of the figure. I will now deal with other points of interest.

Characteristics of the Figure.

1. Age.—The "form" was that of a man of middle age. Judging by usual methods, I should put his age as fifty, more or less. It is obviously impossible, however, to state this with any degree of accuracy, and I only mention it to show that its appearance was entirely different from that of Mr. Eglinton, who will attain his twenty-eighth year in July next.

2. Height.—The figure was certainly taller than Mr. Eglinton—upon actual measurement four inches. I decided this by noting the stature by means of objects on the walls and afterwards comparing the height of the medium in the same manner. Another means of testing this fact was afforded on two occasions, when the "form" and the psychic were standing side by side, both being firmly planted on the ground. The estimate obtained in this way tallied with that obtained in the other way.

3. Face.—The features were regular, full, and animated. I distinctly saw the forehead, eyes, nose, and ears; the mouth was hidden by a full growth of dark hair on the upper and lower lips and chin. The beard, also dark, but tinged with grey, was long and flowing, divided in the centre, and fell upon the chest. The eyes were deeply set, and the forehead high. The hair on the head, though dark in colour, did not appear to me so dark as that of the beard.

4. Figure.—This was massively built, and appeared solid and substantial. When passing round the circle the tread, though unheard, was distinctly felt. The shoulders were broad and the head was well set back upon them. The feet I saw were naked, but I had no opportunity for further observation. The hand to the touch was warm, soft, and life-like, and although as broad as that of Mr. Eglinton was longer, and its grip was firm and hearty.

5. Clothing.—The "form" was apparelled in a white, flowing robe, fastened round the waist by a girdle. It hung in folds upon the frame of the figure. That portion hanging like a hood from the shoulders, and which formed the canopy under which the "form" was made, was darker in colour and more substantial to the sight than the rest of the garment.

6. Other Characteristics.—The whole "form" was full of life and animation. Though it did not speak, it clearly understood and responded to every request made to it. Gratification was indubitably expressed by the face at the success of the experiment. A careful solicitude was apparent on account of the medium. Twice when the latter was staggering to the ground, the "form" turned away from the circle towards him and grasped the white connecting link between them, which again became visible towards the close of the experiment. After the "form" had had a separate existence for some minutes, the medium, still in an unconscious state, again drew forth the white material above-mentioned from his side and under his coat, and stretched it out towards the "form," which eagerly grasped it.

Another noteworthy feature is the distance the "form" receded from the medium. The farthest point reached was ten feet, as represented by the dotted line in diagram from B to C. The distance from bath-room door to B was six feet. It must, however, be borne in mind that the dotted lines from B to C do not represent the track taken by the form: it approached within six inches of nearly everyone in the circle.

When the medium had returned to the bath-room, water was asked for by means of rappings, and upon my entering the room with a glass of water, and while fumbling in the dark to reach Mr. Eglinton's mouth, I felt a "form" by my side, and my arm was gently guided.

The next day I wrote to each member of the circle, asking them to write out and send me an independent account of what took place. This has been done by several of the witnesses. It will be noticed that on some points of detail there are differences of opinion. After careful perusal, I incline to the belief that these arise from the different positions occupied by the various witnesses. Those present at this séance who have not sent independent accounts of what took place, authorise me to state that they, after reading the reports, approve of what is here written as a correct statement of facts.

By Miss H. WITHALL.

Miss Helen Withall writes:—

Mr. Eglinton entered the room where we were sitting from a small adjoining room, apparently in an entranced condition. He walked several times up and down the circle in a restless, excited manner. This continued for about five or ten minutes. During the time he went twice to Mr. Younger, and once to Mr. Taylor, making some passes over them. Whilst he was walking, I saw on his right side a small blue light, like an electric light. This light was not constantly there, but was evanescent. Mr. Eglinton then stood at about a distance of four feet from those nearest to him, and we saw a white vaporous substance coming from his left side. Mr. Eglinton's hands were in constant action, just as if he were drawing this substance out of himself. It quickly increased in quantity, and gradually reached the ground. There it seemed to rest, and increased in bulk, being, as it were, pushed out by some force in the interior. It then grew in height, until an upward movement divided the substance at the top, and suddenly there stood before us a "form" in human shape; a "form" taller than Mr. Eglinton by two or three inches, unlike him in every feature, with dark hair and long, dark whiskers; a "form" solid to the touch, natural to the eye, dressed in a loose white garment, now no longer vaporous, but appearing of the consistency of a rather thick muslin. At this time there was a connection between the "form" and Mr. Eglinton, which consisted of this vaporous substance. This connection, I am told by others, was, for a time, severed, but was afterwards re-connected. My own observation is faulty here, as my interest for a moment was absorbed in Mr. Eglinton, who was now standing close by me, and I feared was becoming too exhausted. As soon as the "form" was fully developed—a "form" like to a man—he turned away from the medium and walked round the circle, shaking hands with several of the sitters. He held my hand, together with that of the gentleman sitting next me, and his grasp was as firm as that of any human hand.

It is difficult at such times, when every nerve and every feeling is at the extremest tension, to say how time passes, but I should imagine that the "form" was present with us from five to eight minutes. When the last shake of the hands was given, Mr. Eglinton as by a strong attractive force seemed drawn to the "form," and the two closely together walked towards the small adjoining room, separated only by a curtain from the room in which we sat. There they stood for a moment, the "form" protecting Mr. Eglinton with tender care, passing behind the curtain, and vanishing from our sight.

Our visitor, form, spirit, or what you will, had come and gone, and left no trace behind. He had come into human shape before our eyes, and had left us to all appearance as perfectly formed as mortal man; for the time even stronger than the medium; but in a few moments he was not; he was gone, whither we cannot tell.

The amount of light during the séance was small, but it was sufficient to tell the time by our watches, and from my position, the gas jet being close behind me, I could see the features so clearly and plainly that I should have had no difficulty in recognising them, had I previously seen or known the "form."

This is a statement of facts, as they appeared to me on the memorable evening of the 17th February. I am glad I was present at, as I suppose, one of the most marvellous séances that ever took place.

By Mr. H. WITHALL.

Mr. Henry Withall sends me the following account:—

The amount of gas-light under which the following materialising phenomena occurred was in reality small, but large in comparison with what has been hitherto allowed at most séances of the kind. The sitters were visible to one another, and the various objects in the room could be seen. The light was also sufficient to enable one, at a distance of twelve feet from the lamp, to just see the time by his watch.

Our seats were arranged in the form of the letter U, with one side extending about five feet beyond the other. The distance between the sitters facing each other was about six feet.

At the commencement of the latter part of the séance, Mr. Eglinton entered the room from the adjoining apartment, which had previously been examined by us and the outer door secured. Apparently entranced, he walked rapidly and repeatedly up and down between the two rows of sitters, stopping once or twice to make passes over two persons. All this time patches of light were intermittently appearing on Mr. Eglinton's left side, more, perhaps, phosphorescent than electric. He was much agitated, and nervously moved his hands about as if in great pain. His breathing was also very laboured.

Mr. Eglinton was now standing between the two end sitters, and there issued from his left side a membranous substance something like very pale yellowish muslin. This by degrees increased in length until it reached the ground. He now lifted his foot on to the bottom rail of a chair close by, and the material, or whatever it was, was now supported by his leg, which seemed surrounded by it as with a canopy. Beneath this, upon the floor, there now seemed some force busy at work, weaving or arranging something, and, forcing up the canopy little by little, raised it until it was about four feet high. This, suddenly parting, revealed to us the fully formed figure of a man standing about four inches taller than Mr. Eglinton, but still attached to him by the membranous substance which first appeared. This process of evolution or materialisation probably occupied four or five minutes.

The materialised spirit was as real and substantial as any human being, and indistinguishable from one. It was clothed in a long pure white garment resembling fine muslin, with a band of the same material about his waist. His head was uncovered; his hair was very dark brown, thick and curly, with beard divided each side of the chin. If the assumption of mortal form necessarily follows upon the lines of the original mortal body, this figure could have been recognised by anyone who might have known him in earth-life.

He greeted us, shaking hands with most of us, but was unable to speak. All this time Mr. Eglinton appeared to be dragged helplessly about wherever he was led by the attraction of the form, and would have fallen if not supported by one of the sitters.

Vitality and strength characterised the materialised spirit; and weakness and helplessness the medium.

After remaining with us a few minutes, the materialised spirit, approaching the medium, from whom he had at times been distant eight to ten feet, led him, supporting him all the time, into the adjoining room and both were hidden by the curtain.

After a few minutes Mr. Eglinton was found conscious, but completely exhausted, our spirit visitor gone or at least invisible.

By Mr. F. M. TAYLOR.

Mr. F. M. Taylor's account is as follows:—

By raps we were told to lower the gas a little, which was done. This was the lowest point at which the light was during the whole of what follows, and it was quite sufficient, as was practically ascertained, for the gentlemen who sat farthest from it to see the time by their watches. The light was opposite the opening to the inner room.

Mr. Eglinton now came from the inner room and commenced restlessly pacing up and down the space between the sitters, at first slowly, than more rapidly, once or twice touching the heads of the two sitters as before. For some minutes he unceasingly paced, never leaving the circle, and was under full observation by all. From head to foot he was visible, chain and pendants, his dark, close-fitting morning coat and buttons, dark trousers, and pale face being capable of the closest scrutiny by all present as he passed them or stood still.

It was noticed by several present, as he moved to and fro, that a very cold wind accompanied him, so much so as to be uncomfortable and chilling.

His breathing became much deeper and quicker, and he seemed in considerable pain; the pace was then slower, the gait slightly unsteady; the breathing became very hurried and deep, accompanied with groans, and as he now stood between the two sitters and within three or four feet of each of them, with the gas-light falling on him in front and the light from the window at his back, a small white spot became apparent at his side by the heart, as it were between waistcoat and coat. The breathing was accelerating every moment, the white spot increased and spread to the edge of his short coat at side and front, forming, as it were, a white lining. The material could now be clearly seen. As it was evolved every moment in increasing volumes, the medium with his hands drawing it in abundance from him, it fell in folds on the carpet, a beautiful snowy mass, some three to three-and-a-half feet across, encircling his feet in front, and in full view of the sitters. After a considerable amount had thus been obtained, and increasing quantities descending, a pulsating movement was observed in the centre of the mass; the whole seemed to rise a few inches and fall, as though inflated, the medium's feet and lower limbs being motionless. As the material descended from his side the mass, rising each time, became greater, till the centre assumed a rounded shape, the size of a coconut, and reached not quite to the height of the knee. This ball, as it were, then commenced swaying laterally, as well as pulsating; the material from the side descending now in greater quantities, the pulsating mass widened out on each side a few inches below the centre ball; and the swaying movement became much more marked, at each movement increasing in height till it reached the medium's waist. The highest portion now became substantial, and lost the thin gauze-like appearance it had hitherto assumed. After swaying rhythmically for some moments, it gradually became higher than the medium, and stood a little to his left, when the upper folds of the gauze fell over, and to the amazement of all present there was the material form of a full-grown man, and in another instant the features were distinctly visible. The hands came from the side of the mass. It was within some six inches of the medium. The moment the hands became visible they seized the material issuing from the medium's side and pulled it out rapidly and energetically (Mr. Eglinton drawing it out from himself). So eager seemed the spirit form that the material parted, and in a moment he caught the portion projecting, and again commenced drawing more. The figure swayed for some time as if not quite steady. It was observed that the material was, however, sufficiently strong to support both it and the medium in upright position. The "form," then, with a motion of his hand across the material severed his connection with the medium.

The "form," thus built up and brought into existence in our presence and under our very eyes, was a man about forty-five to forty-six years of age, some 5ft. 10in. high, broad and strongly built, large shoulders, well set back, dark hair, full large black beard, eyes somewhat sunk and apparently dark, clothed from shoulder to feet in ample folds of the white gauze-like substance. He gave one glance at the medium as though to satisfy himself of his safety, and then shook hands with Mr. Everitt, and, walking round the circle, shook hands with nearly all. The "form" seemed as pleased as we were. When he came to me, I retained possession of his right hand, shaking it most energetically some time, while he was shaking hands (his left) with the lady next me. The hand was well-made, smooth, warm, and slightly moist. He walked to the extreme end of the circle, a distance (by measurement) of ten feet from Mr. Eglinton. After remaining with us some minutes, he passed towards the medium, shook hands with those at that end of the room and then seized the medium, and took him into the bath-room, the curtains closing behind them.

The chief points of this memorable sitting are:—

- 1st. The number of eye-witnesses present—fourteen adults.
- 2nd. The amount of light under which it took place—enough at any part of the circle to see the time by a watch, at least.
- 3rd. The medium's whole body being in full view the whole of the time the figure was forming.
- 4th. The gradual formation of the material and figure.
- 5th. The total distinction and dissimilarity of person and personal appearance of the "form" and the medium when both were under the closest observation at the same time.
- 6th. The life and animation of the "form"—the marked decision of all its movements.
- 7th. The solidity of its substance and the strength it possessed.
- 8th. During the swaying movement, both the hands of the medium were in full view, and did not approach at any time the swaying mass.
- 9th. The "substantial" formation was gradual and even.
- 10th. The features became visible very suddenly.
- 11th. The figure, when fully formed, was within a few (six or seven) inches of the medium—between him and one of the sitters—and observations could be made of the space all round them by those sitting in circle.
- 12th. The curtains across the opening to the inner room never moved in the slightest from the time of Mr. Eglinton leaving it to his being taken in again by the "form."
- 13th. The "form" grew up at first in front, a little to left of medium, and was nearer the circle by a few inches than the medium. When the "form" separated itself from the medium, it was still farther in the circle—not four feet from those on each side.

14th. The medium, when the spirit approached him (after shaking hands with us) seemed completely under his power; the medium's body, however, lost its perpendicular, and was falling from the spirit "form" towards the circle, when the "form" seized Mr. Eglinton and drew him behind the curtain.

15th. The hands and arms were as solid and human, and firmly attached to the body, as a strong man's of his build would be; this I proved by the forcible manner in which I shook his right hand.

In conclusion, it may be stated that throughout these sittings both Mr. Eglinton and his guides have done all that lay in their power to afford us a proof positive of these astounding phenomena.

By MR. T. EVERITT.

There was sufficient gas-light to see the time by my watch. The medium was restless, walking up and down the room. I observed a bright fluttering light, and then noticed protruding from the left breast of his coat, some white material which the medium soon began to pull out in large quantities. This fell on the carpet. Some force seemed moving under this apparently flimsy material, a more solid appearance gradually rising until at last a human being appeared in our midst, who, commencing with me, shook hands with all the members of the circle. Meantime Mr. Eglinton was supported by Mr. Rogers from falling. The "spirit" then took Miss Withall's and my hand in his own left, and extending his right he took hold of some white drapery connected with the medium's body, which, to all appearance, came through his buttoned-up coat, and supported him by it while he gazed steadily into my face. This position gave me a good opportunity of minutely observing the personal appearance of the spirit. He had thick black, bushy hair, with heavy eyebrows of the same colour, whiskers and moustache full, with beard about seven inches long, slightly "Dundreary." The eyes were black, with a mild and gentle expression. His cheeks were flushed or reddish. He possessed great confidence and appeared as a friend among friends. The material that came from the medium formed the white raiment of the spirit, who finally assisted the medium into the ante-room, and thus ended a most remarkable séance.

By MRS. EVERITT.

Mr. Eglinton, after walking restlessly about for a few minutes, stood still very near me, and began pulling out of his left side an apparently soft sort of drapery which fell on the floor. In a short time there appeared the form of a head very near the ground, which gradually became larger and more clearly defined, until at last, a fully developed "form" appeared before us, standing apart from Mr. Eglinton. The medium and "spirit" were together plainly seen by all. The "spirit" shook hands with, I believe, all in the room. The hand was warm and soft to the touch. It was also firmly gripped and shaken by me, showing it to be no dummy, but a really substantial "form." He appeared to me about two or three inches taller than the medium, and had a short, round face, black hair, whiskers, and black eyes. The light from the gas was sufficient to enable the sitters on the opposite side to see the time by their watches. The medium during the whole time was standing away from the inner room and in view of all present. This is the second time I have seen the form developed from the side of Mr. Eglinton. I very gladly add my testimony to that of the other friends present.

By MR. RICHARD PEARCE.

On the evening of the 17th February, I was one of fourteen sitters at a séance for "form materialisation," with Mr. Eglinton as the medium. The sitting was held in a light strong enough for each person to clearly see all objects in the room. I was some twelve feet from the gas-light, but I read the time by my watch, and could distinctly see the features of those sitting opposite to me. After two materialised "forms" had come out from the room which served as the cabinet and retired again, while Mr. Eglinton was inside the same, Mr. Eglinton came into the sitting-room and paced restlessly up and down between the sitters, with every appearance of being ill at ease. As he did so, I noticed a bright light at his left side; this was sometimes yellow, and sometimes changed to a bluish colour, and also moved up and down, and from left to right. At the same time I saw the margin of something white, as if some drapery were beneath his coat, but the coat was not bulged out, and there was no sign of there being any quantity of material. As the medium walked to and fro he began to breathe heavily, and apparently was distressed. He then took up a position at the end of the room, between the curtained entrance to the cabinet and the end sitter (Mrs. Everitt) opposite that entrance. I then saw him pulling with both hands some material from beneath his coat, drawing it out as one might a measuring-tape out of a reel. This material fell over his left leg, and he appeared for a little while to be supporting it with his raised knee; it was opaque, and slightly yellow in colour. As this drapery reached the floor, Mr. Eglinton ceased to give any support to it, and it assumed the shape of a small tent, and a movement could be seen within, as if some live thing were there. The material gradually rose to a height of about three feet, and the outline then gave me the impression that some one was beneath, in a stooping posture, with arms somewhat extended. Gradually, out of this mass of yellowish-white material, there arose the full form of a man. As he rose the drapery (which had apparently formed a screen whilst the incomprehensible "materialisation" was going on) fell downwards but remained clinging to him as a part of his garment, and one portion continued to be connected with Mr. Eglinton, the connection being, not beneath the coat from whence the material seemed to have been pulled, but through the coat just over the heart. This "form," which in every respect appeared to be a perfectly developed man, full of life, grace, and dignity, was clothed in what looked like pure white muslin, with a band of the same around the waist. He appeared to be many years older than Mr. Eglinton, and was quite three inches taller; was well built, had dark hair, moustache, and beard. I was not so placed that I could plainly see the features, but I noted a broad square forehead and deeply set eyes. After pausing near the medium, the "form" passed around the room, shaking hands with nearly every sitter. He appeared gratified at his success and showed much animation of manner, but did not speak. He gave me his left hand, while Mr. Farmer was shaking the right. His hand was warm and the grasp a pleasant and friendly one. The "form" then returned to the end of the room, where Mr. Eglinton was being supported by some of the sitters, and after greeting the friends there he went to the medium, and partly supporting and partly dragging him, they both retired to the cabinet, the "form" being by far the stronger and more lifelike of the two. The conditions under which this manifestation took place leave no room for doubt as to the entire genuineness of the phenomenon. Mr. Eglinton and his controls throughout the series of sittings, of which this was the last, showed every disposition to meet any reasonable wish of the sitters, and I feel highly gratified that I had the privilege of being one of those present.

By MR. D. YOUNGER.

The conditions and what took place are as follows: There were fourteen persons assembled. Mr. Eglinton walked out from the ante-room, apparently in a trance, and came towards me, making several passes over my head and towards the cabinet. He then stood about six feet away from the curtains or any wall. Something light appeared on his side, which expanded and fell down in a kind of dense cloud towards the floor, spreading itself larger and larger, until it opened asunder at the top, when a fully formed "figure" of a man, standing, I should judge, two inches taller than the medium, was visible. It was well made and perfectly developed, with black moustache and beard. He then stepped away from the medium, beginning on one side of the circle, and shook hands with nearly every one composing it. The grasp of his hand, as I felt it, was firm, solid, and moderately warm, but I thought a little clammy. His face was within six inches of my own, and I critically examined his features, which were well formed and handsome, and totally unlike those of the medium. When opposite me he would be about nine or ten feet away from the medium, who was staggering and moaning, and held by one of the sitters, to prevent his falling. One peculiar feature I noticed was a connection like a band between the medium and the form, and attached to both. This band appeared to be about two inches in diameter, and of a dense, cloudy nature, giving it the appearance of a long roll of gossamer. The "form" did not speak. The commencement of this phenomenon was at 8.45 p.m. precisely, as a gentleman sitting next to me pulled out his watch, and we both saw the time distinctly; and this will give your readers an idea of the amount of gas-light at that ever-to-be-remembered séance.

By MRS. FEARN.

I having been present at the séance with Mr. Eglinton, beg to bear witness to the truth of the above-mentioned statements made by Mr. D. Younger.

By MR. E. DAWSON ROGERS.

Will you kindly allow me to say a few words in regard to the séance with Mr. Eglinton on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst.? I do not propose to offer anything like a detailed report of the phenomena which occurred. That, I have no doubt you, as one of the observers, will supply. My object is rather to supplement your report of the chief event of the evening, by placing on record my own observations, in the belief that my position (No. 2) was particularly favourable for correctly noting what occurred. As to the general facts I take it for granted that all the members of the circle will be in complete accord; but it is quite possible that, in regard to some minor points, those who sat at a much greater distance from the medium than I did, may have formed imperfect conclusions in consequence of their less perfect facilities for exact observation.

The medium, breathing heavily and apparently in a deep trance, paced several times up and down between the sitters, a very bright, bluish white light, about the size of a half-crown piece, glittering at his left side, just below the region of the heart. He then took up his position immediately between me and the curtained doorway of the side room—about six feet from the doorway and four feet from myself. The gas lamp was close behind me, and the light, though subdued, was quite sufficient to enable me to see him very distinctly and to note every movement with accuracy.

While thus narrowly watching him, and having no guess of what was coming, I saw Mr. Eglinton's fingers draw a small portion of a light-coloured material from under the left side of his buttoned coat. Some one at the other end of the room called attention to it as a "luminous vapour." It was, however, neither luminous nor vapoury, though to a person of defective vision, or sitting somewhat in the shade, at a distance of ten or twelve feet, and seeing it in contrast with Mr. Eglinton's dark coat, that might probably be a fair description of its appearance. But it was, as I have said, a light-coloured textile fabric—and by no means so white, transparent, and gossamer-like as that in which the figure that subsequently appeared was clothed. Using the fingers of both hands Mr. Eglinton gradually "paid-out" this material till it reached his knees. Then, drawing towards him a small chair which stood near, he placed his left foot on the ledge, so that his left thigh assumed a nearly horizontal position, and the material, as it gradually descended, fell over this thigh on both sides to the floor, covering the leg, and forming, as it were, a miniature tent. With the exception of the leg thus covered, Mr. Eglinton all this time was distinctly visible.

Almost as soon as the material reached the floor I observed a peculiar motion beneath it, as though a small living animal were there, turning its head about in a circular direction. Just at this time Mr. Eglinton withdrew his leg from under its covering, and stood clearly distinct from the material, except that with his hands against his left side he still held the other end of it. Meanwhile—the lifelike motion beneath still continuing—the mass grew in height and volume till, when it had reached a height of about three feet from the floor, Mr. Eglinton staggered a little backwards. By this action he drew off a portion of the covering material, revealing beneath a fully formed living human head, surmounting a large mass of fine white drapery. From its then height of about three feet the figure gradually rose in a few seconds till there stood before us—almost within reach of me—a tall handsome living man, about three inches taller than Mr. Eglinton, who was standing by his side, the only connection between them being the material first seen, one end of which was still attached to Mr. Eglinton's side, the rest hanging in folds from the shoulders of the figure. At first Mr. Eglinton clutched with one hand the end of this "connection," but left hold of it as he staggered towards me. I seized his hands to support him, but the "connection" was still maintained for a minute, as the figure walked off to the other end of the room. While the figure was thus engaged in passing from one to another of the company I was too much occupied with Mr. Eglinton, in helping to support him, to see what became of the "connection" to which I have referred, but I afterwards noticed that it had disappeared.

When the figure returned to my end of the room, I had another opportunity of perfect observation. Having shaken hands with the lady on my left, I took his hand and drew him towards me, asking him at the same time to shake hands with the lady on my right. His face showed an intelligent recognition of my request, and he at once complied.

For some two or three minutes both Mr. Eglinton and the figure had been standing before me, when the former began to stagger backwards towards the curtained door of the side room, and I seized him by the hand to prevent his falling. Finding that he still gravitated in the same direction, I rose from my seat (afraid to loosen my hold), and asked our "strange visitor" whether I should help the medium to the other room. The figure thereupon motioned me to my seat with his hand, and going behind the medium put his arm round his shoulders and, thus sustaining him, both passed backward beyond the curtain.

In conclusion I give a brief description of the "figure." He was a man of middle age, about 5ft. 9in. or 5ft. 10in. in height, and stoutly built. He was clothed with a profusion of fine white drapery reaching from his shoulders to the floor. (I did not see his naked feet, though I heard others say that they did.) Round his waist he wore a broad band of similar material. He had a fine head of curly hair, very dark—his head being otherwise uncovered; broad forehead, dark eyes and eyebrows, dark moustache, and long dark divided beard. His eyes were full of animation, his complexion was somewhat florid, and his face had a kindly expression. I saw him so well that I can recall his features distinctly.

Having thus given an exact record of my observations I leave the facts, without comment, to speak for themselves.

THE DIVINING ROD.—The late Prof. Denton quotes this from Cuth. Crewe:—"Bléton possessed the power; so did Kath. Benter, who could trace water, metals, &c., without using the rod." He says, "Operators with the wand have peculiar sensations in their arms as they approach veins of water, which sensations pass off as they leave the spot under which the veins are. The attraction of a vein of water forty feet deep is as strong as a larger one eighty feet deep."—CYRUS FIELD.

FREE-THOUGHT.—The Materialist scorns the Religionist and the Spiritualist, and they from their standpoint reciprocate the scorn. The scientist who professes to prove all things will turn off from all things not in his own "rut." Yet what can they communicate to us for certain of magnetism and electricity? They can repeat many words about them. Can they define matter intelligibly? or force? Can they demonstrate that life is co-existent solely with matter? Even in political economy do scientists know how to compass the greatest material good to the greatest numbers? Let the widespread misery of the greatest number give the answer. Let our scientists be modest. If they have so much to learn, let them leave off their airs of superiority; let them not persecute thoughts not their own. Let inquiry be free. Let us really have free-thought.—F. J. EMERY.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

"APPARITIONS" FORMED IN FULL VIEW.

II.

BY JOHN S. FARNER.

Since the publication of the narrative in last week's "LIGHT" I have received a letter of which the following is an extract:—

"I consider the evidence of Materialisation of the Human Form complete, as given in 'LIGHT,' 28th February, 1885."

"But for the satisfaction of critics of a certain school, it would have been as well to have added, We all examined the floor and were satisfied there was no trap-door below the pile of muslin, and we are also satisfied that no human being could have crept along the floor under cover of the said pile of muslin from the inner room unobserved."—W.

In reply, I have to state that I had not lost sight of these pleas, nor had others of the witnesses done so. But the absurdity of such explanations of the phenomenon must have so impressed everyone that none thought them worthy of even a bare mention. As regards the trap-door, there were many little incidents in the séance incompatible with such a suggestion. I satisfied myself, however, that none existed, and so can anyone who cares to take the trouble to visit the room. The fact is, the trap-doors, and "fishing-rods," and "broom-sticks" are invented by those who do not know, and those who write from experience only laugh at such vagaries of the imagination.

As regards the possibility of a human being creeping along the floor under cover of the "drapery," unseen by those present, I consider it an impossibility. I should most certainly have observed such an occurrence, and some of the other sitters were even more favourably placed.

This was not the only occasion on which I had observed this phenomenon of the presentation of an apparition in the light with the medium in full view. My observation on the first occasion was, however, far from perfect, and so I abstained from a publication of the details. Others, however, had been more fortunate, and only a day or two previous to the séance described in last week's "LIGHT" I received an account of a similar experience from a gentleman, whose initials, J. H. M., will but thinly veil his identity to many readers of "LIGHT." His account is very interesting, as corroborating in many respects the reports given last week. He desired me, if I published it, to state that he has simply narrated facts as he observed them, and that the account has not been submitted to the other sitters. He says:—

"Our knowledge of the scientific and ethical principles governing and underlying Occultism would be greatly advanced, the facts better understood, and the difficulties diminished, if competent and accurate observers would systematically report any unusual psychic phenomena coming under their notice. Besides furnishing matter of interest to readers, such accounts would provide a record available for future reference and comparison.

"The following narrative is intended as a humble contribution towards this desirable object. The séance at which the phenomena occurred took place on the 11th February, 1885. It was held in London; the psychic was Mr. W. Eglinton, whose character is highly esteemed amongst us. The circle comprised eight persons, exclusive of the sensitive or medium; four ladies and four gentlemen. A gas jet was kept burning during the séance.

"With the first four visitors who materialised on this occasion, no incidents occurred beyond such as have frequently been described in 'LIGHT.' Only one 'form' was able to articulate, and one only was recognised. Moreover, the recognition in question can scarcely be considered completely satisfactory or worthy to be recorded as an instance of identification. Of the members of the circle, only two were sufficiently familiar with the features and figure of the deceased to be able to speak with any degree of conviction. At the request of these friends the 'form,' which purported to be the spiritual body of a deceased member of Parliament, wrote his initials, E. M., on a slate in the room. After the departure of this 'spirit,' the control of the sensitive addressed the circle, and indicated his intention of 'doing something in the room.' By request, the gas was slightly lowered, and, shortly afterwards, the medium—or sensitive, as I prefer calling him—came into the room where we were seated, and, in a state of apparent trance, marched backwards and forwards in front of the sitters. In a few minutes, an appearance resembling a white handkerchief was seen to hang from his side, as from the trousers' pocket. The sensitive then paused in front of me (I occupied a chair at one end of the circle), and seizing my hand, retained it in his own with a convulsive grip during the progress of the phenomenon that followed. Meanwhile the white vapour continued to come forth from the left side of the sensitive, momentarily increasing both in volume and density. As it commenced to assume the outline of a human form, it was watched by all with close attention, and absorbing interest. The sensitive struggled, as if to disengage his arm from me, yet never relaxing the death-like grip of his hand. As the spectators continued gazing, the vapour—if vapour it can be called—condensed, or if it were a substance, it contracted, gradually assuming the shape of a human being until the complete figure of a tall, handsome-looking man, with a dark beard, was materialised before the eyes of the eight persons composing the circle. When fully developed the 'spirit' was several inches taller than the sensitive. For several moments, 'spirit' and sensitive stood side by side—the sensitive being supported by the outstretched arm of the 'spirit' placed lovingly around him. At this point the sensitive released my hand, and withdrawing from the 'spirit' a distance of from three to four feet, revealed a white band, about four inches in width, connecting the side of the sensitive with that of the spirit. The cord of spiritual parturition was then severed. The sensitive stumbled backwards into his chair which had been placed behind the curtain, leaving the sitters alone with the 'spirit.' Our materialised friend then walked before the circle, shook hands with me, and with one or two others. His hand was warm, and as firm to the touch, and as powerful in the grip as that of any human being.

"It was necessary, immediately on the retirement of the 'spirit,' in consequence of the painful exhaustion of the sensitive, to break up the circle, and abruptly terminate the séance.

"In describing the above phenomenon of the materialisation of a 'spirit form,' in the light, in the presence of eight intelligent and educated persons, and with the sensitive in the circle, I have used the terms spirit and figure. I will not quarrel about terms. On a subject of which so little is known, language is necessarily indefinite. Even the term materialisation serves rather to conceal our ignorance than to reveal our knowledge. Those who think it desirable can, for such expressions, substitute the words apparition, ghost, veridical phantom, telepathic automaton, or astral body.

"The unexplained—not understood—fact still remains.

A NOTE ON PHENOMENA.

(From a letter in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, January 17th.)

Truth-seekers who live in surroundings of bigotry and dogmatism have, however repelled by them, to observe silence or bear the stigma of being "infidel." Such has been my experience. But lately, while visiting some friends in Ohio, I have been refreshed by reading the Religio-Philosophical Journal. In it I found narratives which much impressed me, especially as they were supported by others communicated by my friends. But when they said that they themselves had, through a certain medium, seen deceased members of their family in recognisable form, I thought they must have been either the victims of some deception or of their own disturbed imagination. But they urgently invited me to accompany them to this medium, in order that I might judge for myself.

A few days afterwards they took me to Mantua, Ohio. I found the medium was the wife of a farmer, half a mile from the town, Mr. Cobb. Mr. and Mrs. Cobb gave us a cordial welcome; they said that a séance was to be held in the evening, and invited us to remain. At seven o'clock a company of ten were assembled. The room was lighted sufficiently to enable one to read. The medium entered a small enclosure, called a cabinet, which I, as a stranger, had already been invited to examine. Then the company engaged in singing a jubilee melody. In about fifteen minutes the door of the cabinet opened, and a lady, robed in white, stepped out, approached one of those present, and laid her hand upon his shoulder. He addressed her in affectionate terms as "Mary." She replied by nods and gestures. In the same way fifteen other various forms successively appeared, the medium always visible. I recognised one as that of a young man who died six years ago at Jamestown, N.Y. He nodded to me, and made motions habitual to him as I knew him. Another form was that of a young lady with radiant, smiling face and curling golden hair, whom I recognised as a schoolmate and friend, who died a few years ago.

All this seemed incomprehensible. If delusion, how strange that ten people should be under the one similar delusion! I do trust that a scientific investigation will be instituted for investigating phenomena so strange and wonderful.

PSYCHOGRAPHY.

By R. M. N.

(From the Journal of Science for March, 1885.)

"Let honour be paid where honour is due!" The Journal of Science has courageously dared to look an unpopular fact in the face. Others of its class have before now coquetted with the subject, but the least breath of an adverse opinion has produced a wonderfully blinding effect. The tone of this article is almost an ideal one in these days of "blatant truth" and "infallible knowledge"; it discusses the matter calmly, temperately, and judiciously. We congratulate our contemporary, and sincerely assure him that we and all intelligent Spiritualists desire nothing better than to submit our claims to scientific probing such as that recommended in this article. "Truth, the more 'tis shook, it shines."—Ed. of "LIGHT."

The remarkable phenomenon known as Psychography, is exciting very general attention. The question of its genuineness, and, if genuine, of its nature, is being acrimoniously discussed. One distinguished savant, taking unwittingly a leaf out of the book of the Bestiarists, wishes to suppress research in this direction by the blundering arm of the Law. Even the ultima ratio stultorum, the formal appeal to Plutus, has been duly invoked. Surely, therefore, it is time that these alleged facts should be studied in the same calm, cold manner, and with the same indifference as to possible results, as are customary on the announcement of the discovery of a new planet or a new metal.

A word as to my point of view. I am no "Spiritualist." Certain of the doctrines of Spiritualism, as I apprehend them, would be to me highly unwelcome; but to refuse the investigation of novel or unexplained phenomena on such grounds is assuredly unworthy of a man of science. We cannot dispose of truths by the simple process of shutting our eyes and denouncing their discoverers as "skunks."

The facts of so-called "Psychography" are simplicity itself, and will need here merely the barest recapitulation. Two persons meet in any ordinary room: one of them, the so-called medium, sits quietly in a chair, generally near a table of ordinary construction. The other person, whom I will call the investigator, takes two clean slates, binds them firmly together with waxed thread, having left between them a fragment of slate-pencil or of red chalk, and lays them on the table. The medium places his hand upon them, and in a short time, supposing the experiment successful, a sound like that of writing is heard. On untying the slates one of their inner surfaces, or sometimes both, is found covered with writing, whilst the slate-pencil or other material is found worn down as if it had been used.

The features of the experiment have been much modified on different occasions. The slates used are sometimes taken by the observer from a heap kept for the purpose by the medium, and before being used are carefully cleaned by the observer with a sponge and water, and rubbed dry with a cloth. Not unfrequently the observer brings with him a pair of new slates which he has bought on his way to the medium's house. In some cases a double folding-slate has been used, secured by a lock.

The position in which the slates are laid after being secured together has also greatly varied. Sometimes they are laid on the table, the medium touching them with one hand. Sometimes the medium holds them against the under surface of the table with one hand, whilst with the other he holds the hand of the spectator. Again, the spectator has held them upon his own head with one hand, whilst with the other he clasps that of the medium. Or they may be laid upon the table, and never touched by the medium at all. All these experiments, it is well to remember, are performed in full, open daylight.

The nature of the table used, and of the chair in which the medium sits, is a matter of indifference. Both have been carefully examined without disclosing any mechanism or concealed appliances whatever. Other tables and chairs have also been substituted; but the phenomena are unaffected.

Something must also be said concerning the subject-matter of the writing. Very frequently the observer writes some question upon the slates before closing them up, and receives a definite answer—occasionally touching matters known to no living person but himself, and of which the medium cannot be supposed to have any knowledge. Such answers may even be given in languages with which the medium is unacquainted. Nor must it be forgotten that the observer is sometimes asked, after putting both a bit of pencil and a piece of red chalk between the slates, with which shall the expected writing be produced? And the result comes out accordingly.

It is not, I think, necessary to go more closely into the details of psychographic experiments, since they may be found given with considerable minuteness in various works and journals. But the question is, How are these recorded phenomena to be explained?

The first attempted solution is, if nothing else, remarkable for its sweeping character and for its simplicity. The spectators, we are told, are all conscious and intentional liars. Such an explanation scarcely admits of discussion. To most minds it will be utterly inconceivable that a number of persons, of different ages, nationalities, prepossessions, habits, and thought, should agree in forging a falsehood from which they could reap no manner of advantage. Most minds will conclude that were such the case some one witness, at least, would have come forward to expose the fraud—an exposure which, in not a few quarters, would be exceedingly welcome. How, then, on the hypothesis of falsehood, do Spiritualists contrive to seal the lips of each succeeding spectator?

The next hypothesis is that the spectators, though not intentional deceivers, are self-deceived, and fancy that they see occurrences which never took place. Or they are pronounced to be incompetent, untrained observers. A moment's reflection will show that this supposition cannot hold good. In the first place must be noted the extreme simplicity of the phenomena. There is nothing to excite any passion or emotion; nothing to engage ear and eye, and thus draw off the attention of those present from what is being done, or rather from the manner in which it is effected. There is nothing that requires the trained observer or the scientific specialist. Were it a question turning on delicate spectroscopic or microscopic observations, I should not for a moment accept the evidence of a non-specialist, however highly educated, intelligent, and upright. But this is not the case: any sane man of common sense and fair moral character can decide as well as Professor E. Ray Lankester whether the slates used were clean before being tied together,—whether the medium had, or had not, the opportunity of tampering with them,—and whether, when untied, they were found covered with written matter. I repeat it that, to my apprehension, the most illustrious man of science would have no advantage in making such observations.

But I may be told that it is all clever jugglery. Jugglers can certainly do very surprising things, and they are in these days a prosperous and influential class, whose honour and reputation the law appraises at a high figure. But I may, at least, without fear of an action for libel, assert that their power has its limits.

No juggler has as yet reproduced the phenomena of "Psychography" as above described, and under test conditions. If Maskelyne and Cooke will, like Eglinton, sit down at an ordinary table, and, without apparatus of any kind, produce intelligible writing between two locked slates, which never pass into their hands at all, and which they thus have no opportunity of manipulating, we may then, with a show of reason, refer this matter to jugglery.

But let us examine this part of the subject a little more closely. How can jugglery be conceived as possibly producing the results described? It may be said that the writing pre-exists on the slates before they are tied together, and becomes visible in consequence of the escape of—a something. This hypothesis is not easily reconciled with the circumstance that, even when the slates are the property of the medium, they are selected by the observer at haphazard from a heap, and are well cleaned and carefully examined by him before being tied together. But it is put completely out of court by the fact that the slates are often brought by the intending observer, and have never even been seen by the medium or by any possible confederate.

The next supposition is that the medium unties or unfastens the slates after they have been fixed together, executes the writing, and fastens them up again as before. We will take the case most favourable for this view,—that, namely, where the medium holds the slates against the under side of the table with one hand, his other hand and all the rest of his person being full in the view of those present. Are we to admit that with that one hand he unties the slates, supports them and the strings or tapes, performs the writing, and ties the slates together again? If so, great is our faith. It may be urged that there are supports beneath the table, by which the slates, string, &c., are upheld while the medium is writing. I reply that the table has been examined, and that no such contrivances are to be found. But how about those cases where the slates lie all the time open to view, upon the table or on the head of the observer, the medium not touching them at all? Such are crucial instances which completely overthrow this unfastening and writing supposition.

I have also heard it insinuated that the slates upon which the writing is found are not the same pair which have been formally prepared, these latter having been dexterously conveyed away and others substituted. This hypothesis is negated by the cases where the slates remain in view, and are never handled by the medium. It also fails to account for the fact that slates brought by inquirers, and marked privately without the knowledge of the medium, are expressly found not to have been changed.

"The effects are due to electricity or something,"—the something being, I will charitably suppose, some other possibly as yet unknown form of energy. That electricity can produce strange effects I shall not question. Nor shall I dispute that there may be forms of energy still more wonderful. But the table and the seat of the medium contain no hidden batteries, no secret conductors. They may, as I have already pointed out, be exchanged for others. They may also be removed to any other part of the room, or to another room,—a step by which any physical arrangements would necessarily be frustrated. Nor has any spectator detected the presence of electric or magnetic currents on or near the table.

We may go further: electricity, magnetism are not intelligences. By their means it is indeed possible to transmit messages, questions, or answers from one place to another, and to reproduce them in speech or in writing; but there must be an intelligence at the other end of the line. It is utterly inconceivable that electricity or any physical force should of itself combine letters into words, and words into intelligible sentences, conveying often a precise and accurate reply to a question put. It is known that an electric communication passing over a telegraphic system will sometimes set the instruments at work; but the messages thus sent are mere random combinations of letters, which never—save by rare chance—form even a word, and never certainly an intelligible combination of words. Should such a thing ever happen every experienced telegraph operator would feel sure that some trick had been played, and that the message was not and could not be the outcome of an electric storm.

The writing, it seems to me, must indubitably be produced by some intelligence. But what intelligence? Not by a man; for, in addition to the fact that the crumb of pencil or chalk is generally too small to be grasped by human fingers, we have invariably the testimony that no person has or could have in any way interfered with the slates. Surely we are thus driven from post to pillar until we have but one alternative remaining,—the assumption that there must exist around us intelligences invisible and capable of interfering with the course of events, with what we are accustomed to call the order of Nature. What these intelligences are, what is the extent of their power, and under what conditions it is exerted, I am utterly ignorant. They may be, as the Spiritualists hold, the "spirits" of departed human beings; or they may be the "spooks" or "shells" of the Theosophists, the "elemental spirits" of the Rosicrucians, or the fiends and familiars of mediæval sorcery. To which of these classes the agents in question belong is still an unsolved problem. The Spiritualists allege that the minute acquaintance which these intelligences show with family secrets, with private conversations formerly held between the investigator and the deceased friend, prove their identity with such friends. But it is replied by other persons, believers all the same in the reality of Psychography and of kindred phenomena, that if we are surrounded by invisible intelligences they may know our past careers, our actions, our words, perhaps even our thoughts, and may thus easily assume the part of some friend whom we have lost. It is even conceivable that these invisible intelligences may not be spirits at all, but strictly material beings, capable of acting in four or five dimensional space, as expounded in the last issue of the Journal of Science, and which under all ordinary circumstances escape our perceptions.

Hence it seems to me premature to pronounce these and similar manifestations a refutation of Materialism. It is probably still more premature to infer from such phenomena the continued existence of man after what is ordinarily called death. On these points Psychography does not appear to give any definitive assurance.

But the conclusion seems to me unavoidable that if unseen beings, be they spiritual or material,—whatever these terms may mean,—can interfere with the cause of Nature, we have no longer any assurance that like causes will be followed by like effects.

To give an instance: every man who knows that fuel has been laid in a stove, and who some hours afterwards finds it blazing, will conclude—perhaps I must say "would have concluded" until lately—that some human being had set it on fire. Yet we find it recorded in "LIGHT" that a certain family were regularly accustomed, on rising in the morning, to find their kitchen fire had been kindled by some invisible being. Now if "spirits," or four-dimensional beings, can thus interfere, what confidence can we have in the results which we obtain in our chemical and physical laboratories? In fact it is hard to say what basis remains on which Science can be built.

I read, in a recent article in the Journal of Science, how an eminent chemist points out the necessity of performing toxicological investigations in a laboratory to which no one but the operator can have access, lest some interference, intentional or accidental, might take place. But if invisible agencies can interfere, how are they to be excluded?

Bearing in mind these considerations, Spiritualists might well speak in a milder tone of the reluctance of scientific men to accept their results. Of course an unpleasant truth is not the less true if we close our eyes to its evidences and to its existence. But what if the activity of the last forty years has made possible what before was impossible? How if the little "tap, tap" of Spiritualism has not merely "shattered the marble image of Materialism," but broken down a partition-wall which barred out invisible agencies from interference in our world? In that case it strikes me that the refutation of Materialism has cost us far too dear.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am one of those who think it high time that "the Society for Psychical Research, as a result of its investigations, should make some distinct statement as regards Spiritualism." I adopt your own terms, but I should be sorry to believe that the Society, of which I am a member, is one of those bodies who are always learning but never able to arrive at a knowledge of the truth; always investigating, but never able to arrive at any result of their investigations.

The public are apparently expected to view the phenomena almost entirely through the eyes of Messrs. Myers and Gurney, as the "Proceedings" of the Society testify. Now, these two gentlemen are, no doubt, very able and excellent persons, but assuredly they are adepts in the art of "How not to do it." Thus, in Part VII. of the "Proceedings," Mr. Gurney treats the question of Thought-transference as one of a mathematical calculation of probabilities, borrowing the solution of a French mathematician. But this is not the way in which the Psychical Society professes to seek a solution. Is it not a dilatory plea, to distract attention and postpone a verdict? We want them to come to the point, and this they apparently steadfastly refuse to do. I advocate extreme caution, and have a horror of undue precipitation; but neither do I like trivial and microscopic criticism, abundance of which is to be found in the said "Proceedings." Mr. Myers has, indeed, announced his belief in telepathy, but he still cannot believe that a spirit is at one of the poles, though telepathy between two mortals is just as mysterious and unexplainable, and even more so, for a spirit may be naturally supposed to exert a subtle agency like that with more potent effect and at longer distances than a mere mortal. Still he stands shivering on the bank, and dare not take the fatal plunge—fatal as it might be to his reputation for good sense—at least, among materialists.

His yoke-fellow, Mr. Gurney, appears to me in much the same plight. In proof of it, I refer to his dealing with the "Matter through Matter" case. His comment on it in your pages seems to give one the idea of a man inwardly predetermined not to find any amount of testimony sufficient. I say "inwardly predetermined," but not consciously so—such is the casuistry of the human conscience. A staff is quickly found to beat a dog, and reasons are quickly found for shirking a decision one dislikes.

Am I too severe in making this remark? Not in the least. Mr. Gurney professes to subject Dr. Wyld's evidence to the very closest and keenest scrutiny, and yet he all the while neglects to take the most obvious method of finding the truth, which surely was to go to the fountain-head and interview both Dr. Wyld and Mr. Husk. To examine, and, if necessary, cross-examine them both; to bring together the ring and Mr. Husk's hand and wrist. Instead of which he writes in the following loose and vague style: "Dr. Wyld lays stress on certain measurements whereby he thinks he proved that the ring was too small to be passed over the medium's hand. But as there undoubtedly are persons who can get their hands through what look like impossible apertures, and as the degree in which this power is possessed cannot be ascertained except with the bona fide assistance of the person to be tested, the test is one which can never have any real value."

It is obvious to remark that random writing like this can never have any real value, when the writer had every opportunity of verifying the facts. Everything depended on the size and muscularity of the medium's hand. Dr. Wyld calls it "a large and hard hand." If it was a small, soft, squeezable and feminine hand a ring might pass over it, which would have been impossible in a hand of opposite qualities. Why did not Mr. Gurney examine it for himself?

And now about Mr. Eglinton. Is it not passing strange that a society which professes to investigate the claims of Spiritualism, yet neglects (may we say refuses?) to test the pretensions of Mr. Eglinton? He is a medium of world-wide celebrity. He is in London, and Messrs. Myers and Gurney, the two eyes through which the Society sees, are also in London. Mr. Eglinton challenges investigation, and is willing to meet them for the purpose. Why do they refuse? They may say their hands are full at present. But this is a more decisive test, and a more compehensive one, than any they are engaged on. Moreover, delays are dangerous. The medium may not live, or the power may depart from him, or he may remove to a distant country. There is no time like the present. Test him forthwith. Here are two cases of an extraordinary kind—those of Eglinton and Husk—which the Society is bound to investigate, and then to deliver an opinion. By failing to do this are they not wandering in crooked paths when they might take a direct one?

What is the reason? I believe there is nothing they dread so much as to be forced to decide and to proclaim their decision. Therefore they invent a number of dilatory pleas why they should not take these two cases in hand. The Society by so acting frustrates the very object of its existence. Meanwhile they publish the abstruse calculations of M. Richet.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

[Our correspondent has slightly mistaken our meaning. We did not wish to insinuate that the Society feared to investigate spiritual phenomena and report upon them. All we wished to say was, that we believed the time was near at hand when, willingly or not, they would be compelled to answer the question—What are the points of difference and agreement between your Society and its conclusions and Spiritualism? And we expressed a hope that when this question was put to them, and they were obliged to return an answer favourable to the phenomena of Spiritualism, as we believe they must, their experience would be different to that of other committees and investigators similarly placed in the past. That, surely, is quite another thing to suggesting fear of possible result as a factor in their present attitude.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Instruction in Mesmerism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—For the benefit of others who, like myself, are beginners in mesmerism, I am anxious to say that I have received lessons of Mr. Omerin, of 3, Bulstrode-street, Welbeck-street, W., and I am desirous of expressing my gratitude towards him for the kind and considerate way in which he has instructed me. I would advise all beginners to take a few lessons of him. There are several things which, if followed out from instructions given in many books, cannot but fail to do more harm than good. I especially refer to reversed passes used in waking the subject, and I am thankful that Mr. Omerin has taught me the advisability of not using them. Mr. Omerin gives such sound instruction on so many points that I think it would be well for all learners to pay him a visit. I shall feel greatly obliged if you will kindly insert this letter in "LIGHT," so that others may benefit thereby.—I am, dear sir, yours truly,

G. SEYMOUR, A.C.P.

41, St. Augustine's-road, Camden Town, N.W.

February 20th, 1885.

The Tactics of "Truth."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you allow me a word in reference to a well-known contemporary of yours? The editor of Truth is never wearied of ridiculing the proven phenomena of clairvoyance, thought-reading, authenticated apparitions, &c., and in a recent issue he inserted an impertinent note from some stupid person, who had apparently attended a meeting of the Psychical Society (to which I belong) as a guest, and then ridiculed his entertainers in Mr. Labouchere's columns! Not very good taste this, you will say, but quite in keeping with the said editor's traditions. He persistently refused insertion to an article of mine proving the truth of certain abnormal phenomena, and not only has he taken no notice of my accompanying letter, but he will not return my article, though I sent a stamped directed envelope. In a former letter to me he stated contributions would be returned if the author wished it. This gross narrow-mindedness, bigotry, and unfairness on the part of the so-called champion of freedom and justice is singular, is it not? This morning an impertinent card has reached me from his lieutenant—"What is Truth?" Answer. A one-sided and untruthful periodical!—Yours obediently, Eastbourne, February 18th, 1885.

F. B. DOVETON.

Miracles.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondent's, "Trident's," confusion of thought appears to become worse confounded.

Indeed, it is difficult to realise the inconsequential condition of the mind that sees a parallel between one man helping another along a road and angels helping a man to walk on water!

"The angels would find the water as serviceable" in the latter case as the ground would be in the former.

That is, the water would help to support the man's weight. Reductio ad absurdum.

In "Trident's" first letter, he stated the conditions of a superhuman act, which he classified as miraculous. I pointed out that his generalisations of those conditions were also precisely applicable to any human act; they, therefore, afford no definition of the nature of miracle, and we are left alone with "Trident's" opinion that an act is miraculous simply because it is supernatural, which, I repeat, is not enlightening.

"Trident" contends that miracle conveys to him "an idea quite distinct from anything governed by law." He, however, appears to admit that the "two universes" of matter and spirit are the domains of law, and must, therefore, I presume, postulate a third universe for the "zone of miracles"!

Is not one universe sufficient? It is difficult to believe in "all things" and "many others."

Your correspondent's letter, and (may I add?) his thoughts too, far from being too elementary, might with advantage be very much more so.—Your obedient servant,

W. N.

A Deserving Case.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Kindly acknowledge the following amounts for me, and at the same time thank the friends for their response to my appeal. I am still asking for more help. If some one among your numerous readers could find any sort of employment for Mr. Pollen I shall feel greatly obliged:—Mrs. Parrich, 10s.; Mrs. A., 10s.; Mrs. Tebb, 10s.; Mr. Haskins, 10s.; a Friend, 10s.; "Lily," 5s.; Mrs. Maltby, 2s. 6d.—Yours sincerely,

Lilian Villa, Hendon, N.W. (Mrs.) M. A. EVERITT.

March 3rd, 1885.

MISS LOTTIE FOWLER is, we believe, now in London.

ANNOUNCEMENTS of several new books appear in our advertisement column devoted to such notices.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTEN is expected to return to England in April next. She is now speaking every Sunday in New York.

A TRANSLATION into Spanish of Her Majesty's last work, entitled, "More Leaves from the Journal of a Life in the Highlands from 1862 to 1882," is in progress. Mr. F. Omerin, an accomplished Spanish scholar, whose name is known to our readers in another capacity, has been entrusted with the translation.

"M. A. (Oxon)" desires us to insert the following announcement:—"Thanks for the kind thought that prompted you to send the flowers. I will try and find out as to the matter you mention.—M. A. (Oxon)."

"M. A. (Oxon)."—We regret to learn that "M. A. (Oxon)" who was progressing very favourably, and even rapidly, has been cast back by another relapse, which has again confined him to bed. It would seem, however, that this is rather in the way of an effort of nature to rid the system of the poison that still remains in it. It may, therefore, be hoped that when this relapse is overcome, recovery will go on rapidly. We are requested to ask any persons who have any matters of business that they wish to bring before "M. A. (Oxon)," to refrain from doing so until recuperation is complete. While friendly letters that do not necessitate a long answer are very welcome, business details to a weak patient hardly recovering from a very long illness are unmanageable and very wearying.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

We cannot allow the kind gift of Mr. Keulemans and his co-donor to pass without a public acknowledgment, and we now tender our best thanks to these gentlemen. Mr. Keulemans has, we know, spared no pains to make the plates of scientific and artistic value. The result speaks for itself, and we trust the good work, so admirably begun, will be continued by other friends equally generous.

These plates are being sent to every subscriber who receives his or her copy of "LIGHT" direct from the manager; also to those who, obtaining their supplies through Mr. Allen, our publisher, or other agents, made the requisite application on or before the 31st January last. During the past week, we have received many applications for these plates. All these were too late. We exceedingly regret having to refuse, but our friends, if they will give a moment's thought to the matter, will at once see that we could not possibly work in the dark as to the number of copies required. Chromo-lithography is at all times very expensive work, and in this case the cost was considerably heightened by the novelty of the subject necessitating many "tint-stones." As, therefore, the plates were offered as a gift to regular subscribers, the least we could expect was to be put in possession, in good time, of certain details necessary to enable us to decide who were entitled to them. Ample and repeated notice was given, and although, as we have said, we regret the necessity which compels us to adopt such a course, we have no alternative but to adhere to the regulations explicitly laid down.

A few copies have been printed in excess of our estimated demand. These may be obtained of the manager of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, at the rate of 2s. the set of four plates. Parcel postage 6d.

While on this subject of delayed application, we may mention in reference to last week's "LIGHT" (which we promised to reprint if sufficient orders to warrant our doing so were received by Monday morning's post), that it was not until Tuesday, when the type had been "cast down," that the bulk of the requests for extra copies arrived. If our friends will kindly be a little more prompt in future they will often save themselves and others disappointment, and ourselves considerable unnecessary correspondence.

We are compelled to hold over a large amount of interesting and useful matter until our next issue. Amongst articles and correspondence so treated may be included: Report of Miss Rosamond Dale Owen's Address before the London Spiritualist Alliance; The Spiritual Outlook; Mr. Podmore's Reply to Mr. Morell Theobald; "A Vision of a Great Mystery," by "Lily"; Report of a Discussion on Apparitions and Occultism at the Lancaster Philosophical Society; and other communications.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.

I.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

Before entering into an explanation of the different figures represented in these four illustrations, I consider it necessary to make a few introductory remarks as to how, and with what object, these plates were prepared.

As will be seen, the four plates now issued are chromo-lithographic impressions representing some of the phenomena usually called "spiritual." They will, as such, be readily recognised by those who have personally investigated the subject. They are reproductions of original pencil sketches, water-colour, and crayon drawings, prepared immediately after the sances, and the originals are, in their turn, as nearly as possible, faithful representations of the visible objects, &c., which can be witnessed in the presence of physical mediums. Of these original designs I possess a large number, all of which, I hope, circumstances permitting, to reproduce in this journal. The four plates now published were selected for two reasons: firstly, because, by their nature and colour, the four could be printed together; secondly, because they were pre-eminently suited to illustrate facts of a spiritual or occult nature.

It has been often remarked that photography would be the best method to give life-like and trustworthy representations of these mysterious séance-room occurrences. I have, together with some friends, tried the experiment and found it to fail. Small or moving objects, as can be imagined, never come out at all. Materialised forms do not invariably present themselves within the proper focus of the camera (and in the cases where they actually do so, they prove nothing, since they merely represent a "human being" quite indistinguishable from an ordinary mortal), and this method was most deficient in the reproduction of coloured objects. How far "colour" has any direct importance in these matters I will attempt to explain when dealing with Spirit Lights, Plate I.

Being, ex-officio, accustomed to sketching from life (moving life) and from memory, I found little difficulty in composing my drawings. In such cases, when moving objects escaped my careful observation, or when faces were exhibited in insufficient light, I only sketched as much as memory would allow, and corrected this first attempt on the next occasion, when the conditions were more favourable. Some of the sketches had to be altered over and over again, or the object had to be studied thoroughly, by close observation, séance after séance, before it became possible to produce anything resembling the real thing. I must certainly thank several of my "spirit friends" for the patience and willingness they exhibited in thus assisting me in my work; without their co-operation I should certainly have failed to even produce as little as I have up to the present been able to accomplish.

My object in reproducing these sketches is to spread "knowledge;" for what contributes so much to the happiness of man as the assurance that he is an immortal entity? Spiritualism claims to practically demonstrate that there is another life, and it does demonstrate this to, unfortunately, a comparatively few. What is wanted is to make the world aware that Spiritualism is true, its phenomena real, and that in this respect it makes no illusory claims. I, therefore, confine my contributions to the representation of such facts as will tend to prove, by their nature, that they are due to preter-human agency, and cannot be accounted for on any other hypotheses; such facts as could not be counterfeited, or produced by either fraud, trickery, hidden machinery, or by the effect of chemical combinations; such as are demonstrably neither ocular delusions, nor the mere results of a disordered imagination; above all, such facts or phenomena as can be witnessed by every intelligent inquirer, and be produced under circumstances that leave no doubt as to their genuineness.

There are amongst the original designs in my collection at least a dozen subjects, of sufficient interest, if not to convince the unbelieving world, at least to encourage a more universal disposition to investigate these occult phenomena. Several sketches, though as yet incomplete, are intended to represent the process of a materialisation, viz., the gradual transition of a nebulous mass into a solid human form, clad in drapery. (The "spirit hand" enveloped in "drapery," Plate II., is a fragment of one of these sketches.) Any of the originals can be reproduced by lithography, and I am ready gratuitously to offer my time and labour to further the publication, in this journal, of another series, if some one will defray the cost of printing, which is not my department. In the present case these expenses are borne by a friend who wishes to remain anonymous. But I feel at the same time constrained to inform eventual contributors that in no case can I sacrifice my time in the reproduction of the merely sensational, or the portraiture of materialised faces, except when such representations are of psychological and direct scientific importance.

Description of Plate I.—"Spirit Lights."

Fig. 1 represents the so-called "spirit's own light," which I believe means a light, or a substance radiating "light," and which term is used in contradistinction to the cloudy luminosities frequently witnessed near the medium's person, and which appear to be connected with, or to indicate the presence of, the non-materialised spirit.

Fig. 1a is the same luminous substance seen from the side. I must now ask my readers first to compare these two figures with Figs. 2 and 2a. Fig. 2a is also a side view of Fig. 2, and represents the same light under different conditions. The cause of these enormous variations in power of luminosity is, I believe, principally atmospheric. The brighter lights were invariably co-existent with a clear sky, easterly or north-easterly winds, a cold room, and, as a rule, a limited number of persons present. In most cases these brighter lights rested on, and were adjusted partly inside, a kind of receptacle of a reddish colour, which I have never been able to examine, although I have seen a series of photographs in the possession of Mr. T. Blyton, of somewhat similar objects which much resemble the above named receptacle both in size and shape. It is, I have been informed by the "spirits" themselves, like the substance producing the light, manufactured for the purpose, and on the spot, out of the elements present in the séance-room.

Fig. 2. This light varies from a bright greenish blue to a pale greenish yellow, and is at times transparent like crystal, but more often opaque or semi-opaque, and a finger held behind it can be but faintly discerned. The power of luminosity is equal to that of a piece of white-hot iron of double that size, but is far more permanent, lasting from four or five seconds to half a minute. It can be revived by the "spirit" breathing over it; yet, when it is touched by a "spirit finger," there immediately appears, where the contact takes place, a reddish spot, of ill-defined outline, which gradually disappears by further "breathing," or even without this if the light be very powerful and permanent. The size and thickness of this luminous substance also varies; sometimes it is a little larger, but generally of the size as represented in Fig. 2.

As regards its weight, I can best compare it to that of a piece of bees-wax of the same dimensions, for I never was enabled to place it in the scales, and can only judge from it having rested on my fingers.

To the touch, it feels not unlike hard wax or spermaceti, without, however, sticking to the finger. Its temperature is blood-warm, for when I had it on my hand, which was normally warm, no sensation of either cold or heat could be felt. I am aware that the human skin is a very bad thermometer; however, with no other means of examination at my disposal, I could not possibly ascertain the actual degree of temperature peculiar to the substance. By what means it is produced, I am unable to state, and am almost as ignorant with respect to its chemical composition. All I can say is this: It does not appear gradually, but suddenly, and from over the head of the medium. It does not develop or increase in size after becoming visible, but seems to become spontaneously ignited; on each occasion when this spontaneous apparition was witnessed in my presence, I noticed a movement, like a sudden sideward swing of the "spirit's" arm, the hand of which held the light. On some occasions a second "form" could be faintly discerned directly behind the medium, and almost invariably some conversation between the "spirits," antecedent to the operation, may be heard by those present. After lasting a certain time, it gradually but quickly fades away.

Before entering into speculations as regards its chemical compounds, I must recapitulate the most important and peculiar features of this strange luminous substance. Apparition sudden. Duration variable. Power of luminosity variable, and depending on certain conditions. Extinction gradual, but far quicker than that of white-heated iron cooling down. Temperature blood warm. Weight and appearance to the touch, hard wax. Now let us return to Fig. 1. On the right side an extensive blood-coloured patch is visible. From the point of the thumb there are seen to proceed two thin lines with dotted ramifications joining the blood-like spot. These two lines are of a pale greyish red, exactly the colour of living brain matter. The red spot is of the colour of human blood, and is, besides, a substance in a liquid state; for, in most cases, when the light is carried, this liquid sinks deeper into the "disc," and can be seen to assume a globular form, like a big drop of oil in a glass of water. I have also noticed slight, but rapid, vibrations in the ramifications referred to, as though the substance (bioplasm?) still retains its vitality.

From these appearances, and from the fact that the light is seen to proceed directly from over the entranced medium's head, it seems that the substance composing the disc is—living matter abstracted by occult means from the person. How, and through what laws, living, i.e., organic matter, can be made to radiate light is a question I must leave to others of greater physiological and physical knowledge than myself to decide. That it is, nevertheless, organic matter seems to be also indicated by other additional evidence. (1) It has been found that out of the animal brain similar light can be produced; (2) that when produced in the human being—not the medium—exhaustion and headache are the result, and that, also, the medium feels exhausted after the séance; (3) that phosphorus is proven to exist in living matter and more abundantly in the brain than in any other part of the frame. How this light-forming "bioplasm" can be removed from the internal being into the external world is a question I cannot answer, and which I believe cannot be explained by our present knowledge of physics. To use an expression of a familiar manifesting "spirit,"—the process of obtaining the light is: "spiritual alchemy—the effect of superior force over matter, acting upon the properties of matter." The compounds: "condensed living substance." The light: "essence of vitality." It may be observed by our opponents, more especially by those who regard these phenomena as being of "Satanic" origin, that the submission of one's physical body to similar operations is little short of suicide, and that, if these manifestations are true, they are simply "shocking." So they are if indulged in recklessly or extravagantly. But one should always distinguish between use and abuse, and moreover, the amount of vital force so abstracted may not be always, if ever, in excess of what a robust, healthy person may be able to spare. (Were this paper devoted to physiology, anatomy, or pathology, instead of to occult science, a far better comparison could be propounded by way of illustration and justification.) Again, the quantity of vital matter absorbed by the light is, perhaps, not altogether and invariably derived from the medium alone. The lights represented in Fig. 1 and Fig. 2 are, besides, the extremes, and not actual types; for, in the majority of cases, neither a spotless nor a blood-and-brain-marked substance is exhibited. Fig. 1 is a specimen of inferiorly manufactured light. The conditions were that night unfavourable—December and foggy weather! Sometimes, when, for instance, the atmosphere is charged with electricity, or the temperature very low, or when the medium is fatigued, and the circle, perhaps, a little out of sorts, no large lights are produced, but the smaller ones, Figs. 3, 4, 5, and 6, are substituted. These being smaller in volume, require less substance for their formation, and hence will produce less exhaustion to either medium or circle.

Figs. 3 and 4 are apparently of the same chemical composition as Figs. 1 and 2. Figs. 5 and 6 appear to be less solid. In the square light, Fig. 4, as in the dome-shaped Fig. 5, two adhering drops of matter are visible, indicating that probably these, if not all the solid luminous bodies, were likewise liquid in the first stages of their formation. In Fig. 4 the adjacent drop had become hardened; that in Fig. 5 was still liquid and shivering like a drop of quicksilver. Another peculiarity in both Figs. 5 and 6 is that they have a tendency of contracting into a more solid state, in which case the top becomes detached, and remains hovering will-o'-the-wisp-like above the dome.

We now come to a different class of "lights." (Figs. 7, 8, and 9.) Fig. 7 is a somewhat condensed ignis fatuus, and lights of this nature are apparently never carried by the "spirit-hand," but hover about space, expanding and contracting continuously during the short time of their duration. Like the first series, they are first noticed near the medium's head, and from thence travel away at distances varying from a few feet to several yards. Whether they are so carried by a "spirit," or are moved by the latter's will, is a question which, like many others, I am not in a position to answer, but judging from the fact that a "spirit voice" is usually heard to be in close proximity to the moving light, it may be suggested that the latter is located somewhere near the head of the "spirit" (or near what we should discover to be the head if it suddenly assumed a solid condition). These lights, viz., those belonging to the group of which Fig. 7 is a typical representation, may assume any shape or form. Sometimes they are more elongated or take the form of a ring, a cross (X), or a crucifix. Their power of luminosity, i.e., of radiancy, is, comparatively speaking, very inferior, and the strongest I ever witnessed did not even enable me to tell the time by my watch, although the light was immediately against the glass. They are, however, more permanent than the massive lights before noticed, and will last several minutes without losing power or brilliancy.

Fig. 8 is another example of a floating luminosity, but presenting the strange peculiarity of going out with a detonation. Only on a single occasion have I witnessed this particular form of "spirit light," i.e., over the hands of a lady medium during trance. First one light appeared as a star-cloud (somewhat like those one sees through the telescope in several of the constellations of our universe) near her head, and slowly descended towards her left hand, gradually becoming brighter in its centre until it presented the appearance of a bright blueish star. Then it would explode with a short, but audible "click," leaving a mass of blue vapour burning over it, which, in its turn, quickly disappeared from view. Several appeared in succession, until the medium recovered consciousness, when they totally ceased.

Fig. 9 is a similar light, often seen near the medium's person, but of a more permanent nature.

MR. EGLINTON AT ULVERSTON.

EXTRAORDINARY MANIFESTATIONS.

Ulverston is a delightfully picturesque spot in the north of Lancashire, and lying some ten miles from that resplendent queen of the lakes—Windermere, and about an equal distance from that world-famed marvel of industrial enterprise—Barrow-in-Furness. Although it is a place of but 10,000 inhabitants, and has never till recently contained more than from ten to a dozen Spiritualists, it has nevertheless played a comparatively prominent part in the spiritual movement, and distinguished itself more in the advancement of the cause than many a large town can be said to have done. Many years ago, Mr. Thomas Edward Jones, whose transition we recorded some time since, was, while editor of the Ulverston Mirror, a devoted champion of Spiritualism, and was the means, through the agency of some mediums, whom he brought from London, of giving some sittings, and of making several converts. The present editor of the Mirror, Mr. J. G. Speed, is also a Spiritualist, and he has been instrumental in enlightening the Ulverston public still more on the subject by bringing Mrs. Britten, Mr. Mahony, and other lecturers, to the town. He was the means of bringing about the three nights' discussion on Spiritualism between Mr. Mahony and Dr. Anderson there some years ago, and also of bringing Mrs. Britten to attend a performance of "Stuart Cumberland's, exposing Spiritualism," and to expose Cumberland himself the following night. Last summer Mr. Speed had a séance with Mr. Eglinton in London, and obtained, under the most absolute test conditions, a communication which is considered by him to be in the handwriting of the late Mr. T. E. Jones, whom we mention above, and who was a bosom friend of his. The handwriting was identified by Mr. Jones' son as his father's, and a Mr. Joseph Dodd, a printer and bookseller at Ulverston, who was well acquainted with Mr. Jones and his handwriting, immediately he saw that on the slate pronounced it to be that of the deceased gentleman, and after comparing it carefully with some manuscript in his possession, which had belonged to Mr. Jones, was confirmed in the opinion. Other persons whose business made them experts in the comparison of handwriting, compared the calligraphy on the slate with letters written while in earth-life by Mr. Jones, and came to the same conclusion. Mr. Speed was so impressed with the results of his sitting with Mr. Eglinton, and he had experienced so much opposition and ridicule from those who discredited Spiritualism, including a public denunciation by that blustering and pretentious vapourer, Mr. Cumberland, on the occasion of his visit to the town, that he resolved to induce Mr. Eglinton, if possible, to visit Ulverston with a view to furnish such overwhelming proof of the truth of Spiritualism as would silence some of the most aggressive sceptics. Mr. Eglinton, to the great delight of the Spiritualists of Ulverston, and indeed to the satisfaction of many others who were anxious to test his powers, consented to pay Ulverston a visit, and last week he held a series of eight sittings there, seven at the County Hotel, and one at a private house.

The result has been that they have for the most part proved successful, the phenomena transcending in importance and in variety the most sanguine expectations of the sitters, and even of Mr. Eglinton himself. The sittings commenced on Wednesday evening week, and were continued during Thursday and Friday, the number of persons present at one sitting varying from three to five persons, and the circles comprising a clergyman of the Church of England, representatives of the Press, and some of the principal gentry of the district. Mr. Eglinton brought with him a table of peculiar construction, but its only peculiarity consisted in this, that it was ingeniously manufactured so that it could be converted into an oblong box in which Mr. Eglinton carried his slates, &c., in travelling. This table Mr. Eglinton took to pieces in the presence of every circle before the commencement of each séance, and satisfied all present that there was nothing suspicious or artful in its construction. He explained that the occasion of his visit to Ulverston was the first on which the table had been used, and that he had had it constructed because most of the tables he met with were so made that they did not admit of the slate being pressed close up against the under side of the top of them, there being a certain space between, which was, of course, unsatisfactory to the sitters, whereas in the case of his own table the slate could be pressed close against the flap so as to obviate all possibility of a hand being introduced to write on the upper side of the slate, on which the writing always comes. The truth of this explanation was manifest to all, and the following is a certificate which ought to dispel all doubt on the subject:—

29, King-street, Ulverston.

February 23rd, 1885.

I hereby certify that I have been a practical cabinet maker, that I carefully and thoroughly examined the table brought by Mr. Eglinton for his sittings at Ulverston, and that it was in every respect an ordinary Pembroke table except that it was constructed so as to shut up like a box for travelling convenience. I declare that there is no deceptive contrivance about it, and that it appears to be one of the most unlikely description to be selected by a conjurer for his purpose. I may also state that I am not a Spiritualist.—

T. W. GOWLAND.

Mr. Eglinton, moreover, expressed his readiness in case the sitters were dissatisfied with his use of his own table, to use another belonging to the hotel, but all were so convinced that the former was a perfectly bond fide article that none thought it necessary to suggest that he should employ another. The manifestations which were produced in the presence of the various sitters were of the most astounding character; indeed, were of such a marvellous description that Mr. Eglinton declared he had never before had such an extraordinary series of successes. Almost every individual who sat obtained a direct answer to a question written in the celebrated Bramah-locked slate. The sitters in many instances carried the slate to the door, and there, where nobody could possibly observe what was written, wrote the question in the slate and locked it before approaching the table, then handed it to the medium, who would hold it under the table for a short time, then place it upon the table in full view of all the sitters, and the pencil was distinctly heard by everyone present, writing the reply. A large number of communications were obtained upon single slates or upon the under one of two slates held under the table, one above another, by the medium, who always pressed them close up against the under side of the table top. In some cases the slates were thus held by one of the circle, and by the medium together. It was remarked in every instance that the writing came on the upper side of the slate, and was written at the end of it furthest from the medium's hand, and was written upside down, looked at from that end which he held. This fact of itself was considered by most of those present as conclusive proof that Mr. Eglinton could not be the writer. Moreover, while he thus held the slate, his right hand was invariably joined to that of the person writing next to him, a fact which rendered doubly sure the assurance that it was impossible for him to execute the writing. In several instances messages were obtained between two single slates placed on the table, with the hands of the medium and those of one of the sitters placed upon them. One gentleman, Mr. James Hamer, obtained an answer to a question addressed to the spirit of his late employer, the reply being signed in his name, and though Mr. Hamer stated that the handwriting was not that of the person appended, he admitted that it was like it in style. In two or three instances the medium laid a single slate on the table, and while he and another placed their hands on the top of it, writing came on the under side of it. Three somewhat lengthy communications were obtained under startling conditions. Two single slates, placed one above another, were held by the medium and all, or most, of the members of the circle, above the table, and while thus sustained in air, though the medium's hands were outside of them, and the slates were kept firmly closed by the united pressure of those present, there came the unmistakable sound of writing within them. On the three taps being given which always come at the conclusion of a communication, the top slate was removed, and the upper side of the under one was found covered with writing by one of Mr. Eglinton's guides, in the midst of which occurred two Greek lines, which were correctly translated by one of the circle as "concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant." The following was the communication: "We are glad to be in a position this morning to give to you this overwhelming proof of our power to write under conditions that are ordinarily impossible. We should not have been enabled to do this had we not been buoyed up by your sympathy. That more do not carry out the injunction of Paul is cause for much surprise on our part, but we do not base our pretensions upon what we may tell you so much as we do upon the power of setting the known laws at defiance, by which means only will men think." Another communication was obtained between two slates held in the air by the medium and several of the sitters, which was given in a manner that was most remarkable, and which Mr. Eglinton stated was unprecedented in his experience. It was written in the form of a circle, line within line, the three last words filling crosswise the small space in the centre of the circle, the last word being written below the previous two, and upside down in relation to them. The following was the communication: "It is unnecessary for us to say that this writing is produced under conditions that are the despair of science. Surely, granting that your dear friends can return to the earth-sphere again, there is nothing opposed to preconceived ideas. Read your Bible." This communication, notwithstanding the form in which it appeared, was written with the utmost rapidity; indeed, the celerity with which this and all the other more lengthy messages were written was such that the fastest penman could nothing like equal such a speed. But one of the most amazing manifestations that were given was the following. Two single slates, one upon the other, were placed on the chair of a solicitor who was present, and he sat upon them, holding the slate by the edges with the medium. Immediately he sat down the pencil commenced to write, with a marvellous rapidity and a loudness of sound that were most remarkable. On the solicitor rising, the upper side of the under slate was filled with the following communication: "It is, unfortunately, too often the case that men attempt to deny that of which they have never had previous experience, however much the intellect of the generation may be against them. These phenomena are not produced solely with a view to convince you that we are what we profess to be, so much as with a desire to prove there may be forces in existence of which you know nothing. Les esprits médiocres condamnent d'ordinaire tout ce que passe leur—and is not this the case with those who deny the possibility of your communing with those you have loved and lost.—T.E.J." The dash is put in place of a word which is undecipherable, but from the translation of the other words the sentence obviously means, "Mediocre minds usually condemn all which passes their comprehension."

Of all the sittings only one proved a failure, that at the private house, and even that was but a comparative one, for results were obtained. The spirits there wrote on a slate held under the table—not the medium's, it may be observed, but one belonging to the house—that there was no power, and that it would be useless to proceed. Mr. Eglinton under the circumstances emphatically declined to accept any fee, but on a reduced amount being pressed upon him consented to do so.

It ought to be mentioned that the sances were all of course in the broad light of day, or of gas burning to the utmost height; that the slates were always seen to be perfectly blank before being held for the messages; that the pencil was frequently observed to be immediately under the last letter of the last word when the writing was shown, and that in many cases the communications were obtained on the sitters' own slates, some of which were previously initialed by them to ensure that no changing of the slates should take place. At some of the circles the pencil was marked by the sitters before the phenomena commenced, and after writing had been executed was identified; and the pencil was frequently examined, and found to have been worn exactly as it would be if used in writing. In order to convince the circles that there could be no chemical preparation of the slates, sitters were, in several instances, obliged with the test of the writing on the slate of words dictated by them, while it was held by the medium. It may be mentioned further that the Bramah-locked slate was for half an hour in the hands of the Mr. Gowland whose certificate appears above, and he and another person thoroughly examined it and are prepared to certify that its construction is that of an ordinary folding slate, and that there is no secret contrivance about it. The news of the results of Mr. Eglinton's sances has created an extraordinary excitement and an immense amount of discussion in the town. Of the twenty-two persons who sat only some five were Spiritualists, but at least four converts have been made by Mr. Eglinton's wonderful exhibitions, and the majority of those who witnessed them, including some of the acutest and most intelligent men in the town, appear to be convinced that the phenomena were produced under such conditions as precluded all possibility of conjuring or trickery. The Spiritualists of Ulverston and the sitters generally express their high appreciation of the exceptional privilege which has been conferred upon them by Mr. Eglinton in their being favoured by him with so deeply interesting and so amazing an exposition of his powers, and it is earnestly trusted that he will repeat his visit at no distant date.

The Fédération Spirite Belge has formed a society for assuring to its members the execution of their last wishes; the funds of the society to accrue from a moderate annual subscription and voluntary donations. The society is to furnish a mortuary cloth (drap mortuaire), letters of invitation to the funeral, and depute a competent friend to speak at the interment in name of Spiritualists.—Le Messager.

OBSESSION (f).—A boy aged nine years and a-half was staying with an aunt at Nanur. Wherever he was, furniture used to be upset, and small articles broken. The aunt sent him back to his parents, named Bourson, at Lens, P. de Calais. There, one day, some coins, which the mother had placed on the table, were thrown at her by some unseen agency. The boy has sometimes been jerked out of his bed. When sitting at his tasks, his whole body is shaken, his chair and table are upset, and his slate covered with scrawls. The case having been reported by a Spiritualist friend in that locality to the Union Spirituelle, the committee has invited the father of the boy to bring him here to Liège, in the hope of being able to render service in the case, the Union proposing to bear all charges.—Le Messager.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

Mr. Peter Lee on Rochdale Spiritualism.

On Sunday, February 22nd, Mr. Peter Lee delivered a brief lecture on "The Past and Present of Spiritualism," in the Assembly Room of the Conservative Stores, Oldham-road, Rochdale. It had been advertised in both local papers that he would make a statement affecting Spiritualism in Rochdale, and several persons were amongst the audience from both societies in the town. Having reviewed the history of the movement, he said that the spirit of inquiry was never keener than now, and pointed out that in such centres as Liverpool and Blackburn new halls were to be opened in connection with the spiritual movement. Referring to the statement he had to make, Mr. Lee said that, unfortunately, an attempt had been made to gag him, but he was not to be gagged. He appeared as a free individual on a free platform, and should express such sentiments as he deemed fit in regard to Spiritualism in Rochdale. He had been connected with the spiritual movement about four years; he had observed and studied a good deal during that period, and presumed that he could speak with some little authority on the subject. Many before him would remember that not very long ago a fraud was discovered in the neighbourhood in connection with the movement. It was known to be such at the time; the medium referred to was closely surrounded by devotees, and by this means was enabled, for a time, to perpetuate his fraud. At length the bubble burst, and brought on the bursting of the Spiritualist Society in the town. The movement did not die out, and mediums were brought from time to time who were competent, such as Mrs. Britten and Mr. Johnson, and others. Eventually there got on to the platform a series of mediums not altogether suitable for representing Spiritualism, and it became necessary for them to set their faces against it. This caused another upset, and the founding of an opposition society. Consequently, there had been two societies pulling at the various mediums obtainable; whilst, if there were not two societies, but only one, there would be sufficient Spiritualists in the town to form a society so strong that they would be able to procure a series of competent representatives of Spiritualism every Sunday throughout the year. As things were now the platform was found empty at one place on a Sunday, and the other either empty or indifferently supplied. The result was that Spiritualism in Rochdale was at present in a rather sorry plight in connection with this branch of the movement. In the face of all this, he was present that morning to state, candidly and fearlessly, that as long as he had the power to bring other mediums into the town, whether the two societies continued to exist or not, he should do so. As to the issue, he had no doubt whatever, for by pursuing this course he had drawn around him persons sufficiently competent in every way who would assist in lifting the spiritual movement into such a position as it had been lifted into in Liverpool, Blackburn, Glasgow, and London. Orthodox preachers delivered sermons to their listeners, intelligently, and the latter found the money to pay for it. General Booth did the same sort of thing with his followers of no education, or possessing but very meagre intelligence, and yet money was forthcoming with which to pay them fairly remunerative salaries. But, so surely as Spiritualism had grown to its present condition under the influence of the All-Wise, if they liked, then so surely would the All-Wise, or that power which was wiser than themselves, provide that with which to put the spiritual philosophy before the public in a proper manner. He had at one time rather narrow views in regard to paying for religious teaching; but about three years ago Mrs. Britten in a letter to him said: "I will not make one class of labour sacred and another profane, by taking pay for one and refusing it for the other, but will make all labour sacred by taking adequate pay for it." On consideration, this proposition would be found to contain reason and sound logic in it, and would be found to be incontrovertible. What did they pay for mediums? Mrs. Britten's charge was about a guinea; the same might be said of Mr. Colville, Mr. Morse, and others. A society of thirty or forty members could pay that easily, assisted by the congregations of from 300 to 400 who on Sundays would turn out to hear such a class of mediums. About a penny per head would do it, and leave a surplus in hand. In the Press and on the platform he should use his pen and voice against the condition of things they had had of late. Mediums had been put on to the two platforms, some of whom could not speak their native tongue correctly, and others who fearfully mutilated the Queen's English.

He spoke in disparaging terms of societies employing such mediums. It was a method of procedure which was doing more harm than good; such mediums ought to be used in connection with investigation circles, and not be dragged before the public in a scarcely half-developed condition. To put that class of mediums on spiritual rostrums of the kind referred to was a hoax on common-sense, and as long as the necessity existed he should protest against such a line of procedure.—In the afternoon and evening Mr. Johnson, of Hyde, spoke on suitable topics, and imparted some useful information and advice to some present who were, in a sense, strangers to Spiritual Philosophy.

GLASGOW.—At the morning meeting of the Spiritualists here last Sunday, what has for some time been looked upon by a number of the Society's members as an unpleasant and unseemly development in connection with these services, "came to a head," and it is now fondly hoped, was expelled, as unhealthy humours should be. The privilege of addressing questions to the guides of the medium, Mr. or Mrs. Wallis as the case might be, having been freely extended to those who chose to frequent the Sunday morning meetings, ad libitum questioning soon changed into ad infinitum debates and controversy; so that the spiritual ministrations of the intelligences controlling the mediums were oftentimes overshadowed by the "cloudy umbrage" thus engendered in the minds of the assembly, their efforts to be of service as teachers from the other and higher side of life thwarted, and their inspirations eclipsed. At length, however, a sort of climax has been reached. The debating last Sunday morning having become more than usually discursive, and the efforts of everybody to convince everybody else more than usually impotent, the clôture was enforced, and a vote taken on the question as to whether such practices were to continue or no; whether, in short, as a member somewhat facetiously but not unaptly put it, "we were to come there to teach the spirits or be taught by them"! The result of the division, it is gratifying to say, did credit to the good sense, not to say good manners, of the meeting; for by a sweeping majority it was resolved that it was more seemly to invite instruction from the invisibles and hearken to them with respect, than to expect that they should submit to the promiscuous harangues of every one who might have a pet philosophy or a "new idea" to ventilate. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the early popularity of these morning services will shortly return, and, with an increase of concord and general harmony amongst the members, that the clairvoyant powers of both Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, whilst under control of their respective guides, will be more actively called into play for the benefit alike of inquirers and members. In the evening, it being "Question Night," the guides of Mr. Wallis disposed of a variety of questions submitted in writing, answering them all with their usual ability and to the evident satisfaction of the meeting, which was a pretty fair one in point of numbers. Having accomplished their task before the usual time for breaking-up, the guides took occasion to refer to their personal work—what their intentions and desires were in connection with Spiritualism, and especially with the movement in Glasgow; and in the course of their remarks, delivered a powerful and stirring appeal to Spiritualists to be "up and doing" in the discharge of saving and beneficent duties, as befitted those who possessed a truth of infinite importance to their fellows—acornfully impatient of the disposition that would debase Spiritualism into an intellectualism to wrangle over and split hairs about. Those who now knew somewhat of the true meaning of life, death, and immortality could surely afford to abstain from the cowardly selfishness involved in the consuming desire to get "salvation for their souls," and that only, and be prepared to do battle for the right, the true, and the good, letting "their souls" reap what benefit might be derived from such manly and elevating effort. Next Sunday evening, Mr. Wallis' subject is "Three Curses, and How to Cure Them."—ST. MUNDO.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Sunday, March 1st, Mr. J. Burns attended a conference in the morning, when the position of Spiritualism in the town and the means of extending its usefulness, were discussed. Several suggestions were made. In the evening he addressed a crowded audience—a large majority of them strangers—on Spiritualism. He described the objections made by scientists to the phenomena, and pointed out how they failed to explain them. He showed how science could explain the movements of a telegraph needle, but failed to explain what electricity was. So Spiritualists find intelligence in the movements of tables. Man is as spiritual now as after he dies; and if Mrs. Groom could describe spirits she exercised spiritual gifts while in the body. "Some mediums can see into the bodies of others as easily as we can see through a glass tumbler. Others can see the light flowing from a magnet, and describe it as like the nervous fluid that flows from the fingers of human beings, the magnet, of course, having no volition. Spiritualism investigates the relation of good and evil to man's future life, and finds that as he lives here so he will continue there. Fifty years ago physical developments, which are the commonplaces of to-day, would have been derided. Spiritualism teaches man how to control the conditions of his lower nature, which to-day puzzles the sociologists." He went on to comment on the singular hostility of religionists and scientists to Spiritualism. But it is easy to see that many books have long been developing a spiritualist feeling and doctrine without knowing it. To all men must come the questions: Who made all things? Whither are all things tending? Spiritualism furnishes the reply, first negatively by sweeping away theological conceptions; secondly, in a positive way, by giving a theory which answered those questions. Mr. Burns was listened to with deep interest, and produced a great impression.—Mrs. Groom followed with spirit delineations, of which fifteen were recognised, three persons only of those to whom the spirits with them were described failing to recognise the minute descriptions given of their friends in spirit-life. There is a growing interest in the subject in the town.—Cor.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S. President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mages, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brongham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

An appeal was made to Boston Spiritualists to furnish the Spiritual Temple, recently erected as a free gift, at a cost of £30,000, in that city. Towards this object (the furnishing) one gentleman sent his cheque for 5,000dol. while several contributed 1,000dol. each. Spiritualists in Great Britain must surely be very poor!

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Porty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE TELEPATHIC THEORY.

Telepathy is a word adopted by the leaders of the Society for Psychical Research as one which expresses the view they take of almost all spiritualistic phenomena so-called, so far as the experiments and observations of the Society have been recorded.

The word means far-feeling, or feeling at a distance by means of the brain.

For instance, Thought-transference is explained on the telepathic theory, and the apparitions of ghosts occurring at the time of death are explained as instances of the minds of the dying so operating as to cause cerebrations which act on others at a distance or telepathically.

Further, in the February number of the Contemporary Review there is an article by Mr. Myers, the inventor of the term, in which he "believes that he has shown that in the vast majority of cases where Spiritualists are prone to refer automatic writing to some unseen intelligence there is really no valid ground for such an assumption."

The facts which Mr. Myers puts forward as proof of his hypothesis as to automatic writing are very few, and by no means warrant the conclusions he has arrived at; and, especially, his theory that automatic writing is sometimes produced by the cerebration of brains at a distance from the automatic writer, is one which at most must be of very rare occurrence.

Most Spiritualists will admit that a large proportion of automatic writing may arise out of unconscious brain cerebration, and they will also admit that as man is a spiritual being while in the flesh, a considerable proportion of automatic writings may be dictated by his own spiritual nature, unknown to his earthly reason; but all Spiritualists believe in inspiration by spiritual beings outside themselves, and that, therefore, automatic writing must sometimes proceed from this source. However, it is well that the scepticism of Mr. Myers should be brought to bear on Spiritualists in this matter, and that the subject should be reconsidered, and it is to be desired that those who can give instances in which automatic writing must have come from external sources, should record them in "LIGHT."

Mr. Myers certainly qualifies his sweeping assertion when he adds: "I am, indeed, aware that some cases of a different kind (to unconscious cerebration) are alleged to exist—cases where automatic writing has communicated facts demonstrably not known to the writer or to any one present. How far these cases can satisfy the very rigid scrutiny to which they ought obviously to be subjected is a question which I may perhaps find some other opportunity of discussing."

Now surely it was Mr. Myers' obvious duty as an investigator of psychic facts, to subject the statements of Spiritualists to "a very rigorous scrutiny" before committing himself to a theory which would dispense with all spiritualistic agency, and reduce spiritualistic phenomena so-called, to the operation of physical movements only.

In the July number of the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Myers and Mr. Gurney actually attempt to exhibit a case of apparition an hour after death as one of telepathic brain action on the part of the deceased!

Subsequent investigation proved that the instance referred to had been most incorrectly reported to those gentlemen, and the theory in this instance collapsed with the case. But really one could not at the time resist the impression that the writers were amusing themselves at the expense of their readers, in gravely informing them that a brain could act telepathically an hour after the man was dead. Surely this was pushing the far-feeling theory a little too far.

One naturally would conclude that the heads of a society for Psychical Research would believe in the Psyche; but if the telepathic theory is true, then the Society should be named the Society for Tele-Cerebral Research, or the Society for Occult Physiological Research.

It is well, I think, that we should all take it to heart that the Society, so far as it has proceeded, has not admitted any belief in mind, soul, or spirit, apart from a human organisation; but has given us a telepathic theory which virtually says—mind, soul, spirit, are, so far as we know, only matter in motion.

With regard to automatic writing, a friend narrated to me as follows: "Three children known to me, ages six to nine, some years ago were playing with planchette, when it wrote verses in a language unknown to the children or to their mother, but which the father, when he returned home, discovered to be taken from one of the Roman poets."

Now it is conceivable that the father, if he had trained his children mesmerically, might have been able, to some extent, to control his children from a distance. But in the present instance no such training had been practised, and it is to me inconceivable that the father's brain, or any other brain, could have unconsciously controlled these children to write Latin verses.

We nearly all know, as a matter of fact, that direct writing can be produced within locked slates or cabinets; but such writing is entirely beyond explanation by the telepathic theory, unless, indeed, the advocates of that theory would maintain that brain cerebrations could penetrate wood and slate, and, seizing on crumbs of pencil, could write with intelligence, and at a speed ten times greater than is possible to any human being!

Now, if it is admitted that direct slate-writing is beyond the telepathic explanation, and is produced by an intelligence without a visible organisation, how infinitely easier it is to believe that this same outside intelligence could, and does, control human hands to produce automatic writing.

In the presence of Napoleon III., a detached hand was seen by all present to write in the light and on the table immediately under inspection, and this hand was kissed by the Emperor. Was all this the result of the telepathic cerebration of Mr. Home?

Mr. Houghton, in last week's "LIGHT," is indignant with the members of the Society for Psychical Research for not experimenting with Mr. Eglinton; but it is pretty widely known that they have sat with him, but that no member who holds the telepathic theory has ever had any proof of slate-writing.

This has caused wonder and mortification, but the failure is easily explainable on the telepathic theory. The sensitive and his controls, feeling that they were surrounded by a hostile prejudging influence, were thus paralysed.

Mr. Myers expresses his opinion in his article in the Contemporary, p. 243, that "the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research must for a long time be largely occupied with telepathic researches." If so, I fear the subscribers to the Society may begin at last to feel that they do not get much for their money.

The Society has done admirable work in bringing into some order the "willing game," so long the amusement of society; and the Society has further enjoyed the great advantage of being presided over by a gentleman of high character and position, and has thus obtained an outlet for its records in the public Press.

But I have this against the managers of the Society, that, while inviting discussions at its public meetings, they most carefully withhold from their printed reports, the names and the thoughts of the few thinkers who venture to call the telepathic and other conclusions in question. This jealous exclusiveness is surely not justifiable in an open society avowing itself to be one of research.

Those who believe in the Spiritualistic view and have united themselves into the London Spiritualist Alliance can produce abundant proof of—(1) True clairvoyance as distinguished from thought-reading. (2) Direct psychic or spirit writing within closed slates or cabinets. (3) The "passage of matter through matter." (4) The materialisation of the human form. And those who prefer spiritual facts to physiological theories are invited to join this Society.

If telepathy be true, is it not strange that those who believe in it are totally impervious to its influence, and those only can receive "thought-transference" who are psychics, or mediums—that is, those who believe in spirit communication?

Further, if ghosts at the time of death are caused by brain cerebration, how is it that not one dying brain in a million can telepathically cerebration a ghost?

In conclusion, it is a remarkable and very serious matter for consideration, that a society carefully inaugurated under the auspices of "all the talents" for the purposes of Psychical Research, should, after three years' labour, find itself, as it were, deliberately and laboriously stranded in a form of agnosticism; and, while ignoring the spiritualistic theory, should expend about £1,000 a-year in a subtle attempt, under the disguise of a Greek synonym, to insinuate into the inquiring mind a quasi-scientific form of materialism.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Several communications stand over until next week; amongst others, letters from "M. D. Edin." and S. R. Watson.

TRANSITION OF PROFESSOR CASSALL.—At the moment of going to press we learn the sad news that Professor Cassall, LL.D., of University College, a member of the Council of the L.S.A., passed to the higher life at 1.15 on the morning of Wednesday. We shall hope to give more details next week.

Le Spiritisme (Paris) gives a translation of the opening address of the Society for Psychical Research; and the Revue Spirite translates the report of its Literary Committee.

"SPIRITUALISM AT HOME."

BY FRANK PODMORE, M.A.

Mr. Theobald is, no doubt, within his rights in deferring the discussion of the poems of Saadi and the life-history of "Wanik" until such time as he can demonstrate that my account of these matters is inaccurate. But I must demur to his passing over my challenge on another question. In "LIGHT" of the 31st January Mr. Theobald stated that he had submitted the Greek quotation and my comments to a Spiritualist and competent Greek scholar of my acquaintance, who had pronounced my criticism of the Greek untrustworthy. In "LIGHT" of February 14th I stated that I had received a letter from a Spiritualist friend of mine, who had been consulted by Mr. Theobald on the Greek, and I quoted the following sentence from my correspondent's letter: "I could have no decided opinion, for my knowledge of Greek is scarcely beyond the alphabet." . . . And I have since learnt, at a personal interview, that Mr. Theobald was given to understand this very clearly. Now, I want to know if my correspondent is identical with the "Greek scholar" referred to by Mr. Theobald. For if they are identical—as we may assume in the absence of an express denial—it is hardly possible to characterise Mr. Theobald's version of the matter in too strong language. "Absolutely dishonest" is the description given of it in my hearing by two several persons cognisant of the circumstances. I do not myself think it necessary to impute dishonesty here: nor did I, as Mr. Theobald asserts, hint in my previous letter that he had been a party to fraud of any kind. I see no reason to assume dishonesty on his part; I have large faith in his capacity for unconscious misrepresentation. But until he shall have answered my question about the "Greek scholar," and until he shall have rendered some satisfactory account of his perversion of the facts in regard to the Persian poetry, it is clear that the value of his evidence on any subject is an unknown quantity.

As regards his reply to me in "LIGHT" of February 28th, it is important to note, in the first place, that his assertions have hitherto been made on his own sole authority; whereas every statement of mine which he questions is supported and corroborated by my colleague, Mr. Hughes. Mr. Theobald has omitted—not intentionally, I think, but from sheer carelessness—to take this fact into account, and has thereby gained a dialectical advantage to which he is not entitled: yet I constantly referred to Mr. Hughes' collaboration throughout my letter; and Mr. Hughes added his own confirmation in an independent letter. I call attention again to this fact, because in matters of this kind, which involve a nice discernment and balancing of probabilities, and the exercise of accurate observation, it is of importance that every detail should be established in the mouth of more than one witness. I have now, as on the former occasion, discussed the whole matter with Mr. Hughes before writing my letter, and I shall in this instance also submit the finished letter in manuscript for his revision.

In the next place, I would point out that Mr. Theobald in the first part of the letter which bears his signature has allowed the pen of a ready writer to run away with the discretion of a critic. I wrote that I went down to Blackheath "in my capacity as a member of the Society for Psychical Research." I did not state that I wrote to "LIGHT" in that capacity; still less did I say or imply that in writing to "LIGHT" I was "presenting my report." It would have been extremely informal and indecorous to do so. Mr. Theobald's strictures on my proceedings are, therefore, based on an entirely false assumption. If he is a member of the Society referred to he would, of course, have a right to inquire what report had been presented, and how it had been received; but even so it would clearly be out of place to make such an inquiry or to discuss the matter at all in a public journal.

But though I wrote to "LIGHT" as a private individual, I went down to Mr. Theobald's house in an official capacity, and I stated that fact in my letter, certainly not to gain an adventitious importance to my remarks, but for two valid reasons. I wished it, in the first place, to be clearly understood that I am guilty of no breach of social obligation in making public what I had observed. And in the second place I thought it right to show that my investigation was not the casual result of an afternoon call, but was of the nature of a deliberate and carefully prepared inspection. Whether it was "superficial" or not depends entirely on the accuracy of our observation, and not all on the actual length of time occupied. If Mr. Hughes and I saw in an hour and a-half all that there was to see, and saw it correctly, our investigation was less superficial than Mr. Theobald's twelve months' study of the phenomena. And Mr. Theobald certainly was well aware at the time that our visit was of this official character, for he accepted my proposal to bring with me, as my colleague, the secretary of one of the Society's committees of investigation.

To pass to Mr. Theobald's comments in detail. So far as the "character" of the writing is a matter of opinion, we have Mr. Theobald's unsupported statement on the one hand, against that of Mr. Hughes and myself on the other. If Mr. Theobald wishes to bring the matter to a decisive test he should state exactly how many words or letters are contained in a given space of the writing, and let the readers of "LIGHT" endeavour to compress a like number of words into a similar space. Mr. Theobald has challenged me, as an "educated person," to see what I can do. In the matter of writing I fear that I should certainly be classed by most of my correspondents as a very imperfectly educated person.

But I have succeeded beyond my anticipation—and no doubt others could command an equal measure of success—in rivalling the "spirit writing." If Mr. Hughes and I are accurate in our recollection, ten lines in an inch, or seventy lines in a half-sheet of ordinary notepaper, is the maximum fineness of the spirit writing. Mr. Theobald will correct us if we are wrong. At my first attempt in daylight, I succeeded in writing the whole of the first twenty lines of Mr. Theobald's reply to me in "LIGHT" of February 28th—201 words in all—in a space 1½ in. broad; the average length of the lines being about 2½ in. But as my lines were not quite even and some of the words were indistinct, owing to the softness of the pencil, I made a second attempt, subsequently, with a harder pencil. At this second attempt I succeeded in compressing my lines within exactly the same space as before—twenty lines in 1½ in.; but the average length of the lines is somewhat less—not exceeding 2 in. The lines are perfectly even, and the writing possesses a clearness and regularity of which my normal writing can rarely boast. Mr. Hughes concurs with me in thinking it entirely legible, and I will submit it to the inspection of Mr. Theobald, or any one else who cares to apply to me. Its production occupied me just under ten minutes. Now this writing of mine can be read without the help of a magnifying glass, which Mr. Theobald tells us is necessary in the case of the spirit writing. As that writing is certainly not more minute than mine, I am constrained to believe that it is more indistinct, since it cannot be deciphered without such artificial aid. The only exceptional quality, therefore, which this spirit writing possesses would appear to be its superior illegibility. If Mr. Theobald challenges competition on that ground, there will, I think, be no difficulty in demonstrating that illegibility of the most supreme kind is not incompatible with the conditions of this mortal life.

The rest of Mr. Theobald's letter is based upon two false assumptions, (1) that I said in my former letter what I did not say; (2) and that his alleged private knowledge of certain facts is equivalent, for evidential purposes, to a public statement of them. For, in the first place, I did not venture to propound any conclusions of my own as to the means by which the writings and other phenomena are produced. My sole conclusion was—and, I may add, that remains now my sole conclusion on the matter—that Mr. Theobald had not brought forward sufficient evidence for his hypothesis of abnormal agency. And, in the second place, that conclusion of mine is not overthrown by Mr. Theobald's elaborate demonstration that he was in possession all the time of much better evidence, which he did not bring forward. What he has done in effect is this. He has published from time to time detailed contemporary records of certain occurrences, and he has pointed out certain facts which, in his opinion, prove that these occurrences were due to abnormal causes. It is now shown to him that the facts which he has described prove nothing of the kind, and that the presence of certain other facts, or the observance of certain other precautions, are essential to the proof; and he thereupon declares, some months after the events, that he did observe these other facts at the time, and did take these further precautions. Such a method of argument is calculated neither to strengthen his original position, nor to enhance the value of the additional testimony which he now adduces. For out of his own mouth he is convicted of the grossest inaccuracy—either in not stating at the time the precautions which he did take, or in imagining now that he took precautions which he did not take. But I will go through the facts one by one.

I stated that "all the writings" on the ceilings of the rooms are large and straggling. Mr. Theobald now tells us that my statement is inaccurate, because in at least one instance the writing on the ceiling is small and regular. It is unfortunate that Mr. Theobald should have neglected to show this writing to Mr. Hughes and myself, if it existed at the time of our visit. If it did not exist then, he has no right to accuse me of inaccuracy.

Mr. Theobald states that the ceiling in the hall is 9ft. 4in. in height, and, therefore, out of reach of anyone standing on a chair. Now the "inscribed portion of the ceiling"—the only portion, that is, which bore any writing at the time of our visit—is considerably lower than the general level of the ceiling. If Mr. Theobald means that this special portion of the ceiling is 9ft. 4in. from the floor, he should state this. But if, as I imagine, he means that the general level of the ceiling is 9ft. 4in. from the floor, his remark is not to the point, for I referred solely to that part which is lower than the rest (by reason of an archway or other structural irregularity), and which bears the smaller writing referred to.

I pointed out that, in order to render it certain that there was no writing beyond the "solitary B" before the séance, a careful and prolonged search was requisite. Mr. Theobald now assures us that he conducted a search of this nature. It is unfortunate that he did not state this in his contemporary account of the occurrence, and that the words which he used on that occasion would not, without his subsequent commentary, lead us to suppose that any such search was made.

As regards the writing thrust out of the cabinet during the séance, Mr. Theobald now states that, in addition to looking into the box in order to see if there was some paper there, he had secretly marked the paper beforehand. How unfortunate that he did not mention this most obvious and necessary precaution when questioned by Mr. Hughes and myself within a few weeks of the occurrence.

And if his statement, "the paper in the box had already been secretly marked," is intended to mean that the paper had been marked and introduced into the box in such manner that no person could have had surreptitious access to it in the interval between the marking and the séance, it is unfortunate that the words used are not such as to make that interpretation obvious.

And if the marks used were of such nature, and so frequently varied, as to render fraudulent imitation impossible, it is unfortunate that Mr. Theobald has not said so.

In regard to the locked secretaire, Mr. Theobald makes three distinct statements: (1) That since our visit he has found thicker pieces of paper introduced into the secretaire. (2) That in re-publishing the account in "LIGHT" of June 14th, he knew that the test he described had no real value. (3) That my conclusion was a hasty one.

To which I answer: (1) That if he has had these more satisfactory tests, it is to be regretted that he has published no account of them in "LIGHT," but that, in order to make the tests complete, a very thorough investigation of the piece of furniture is necessary, and a very explicit statement as to the whereabouts of Mr. Theobald's keys, and as to various other matters. (2) That he does describe the test in "LIGHT" of June 14th as if he believed it to have value. (3) That if these further occurrences took place since our visit, the justice of my conclusion, which was avowedly founded solely on the evidence which Mr. Theobald had brought forward, is by no means impugned.

Of the new manifestations recorded in Mr. Theobald's letter it is not necessary at present to take any account. There are persons who would testify, in all good faith, to having seen the cow jump over the moon, if their prepossessions happened to jump that way, and would quote as corroborative testimony to the fact the nursery rhyme in which it is recorded. Until Mr. Theobald—in his own good time, and at his own convenience, if he so please—has explained his allusions to the Persian poetry, and the Greek scholar, and certain other matters, I see no reason why his testimony should not be ranked in the same category with these.

But there is one remark of his which I feel bound to notice. He has insinuated that I am one of those who think that the phenomena called spiritualistic are impossible. That insinuation is a most unwarrantable one, and, if I believed it to have been made maliciously, I should call it by a harsher name. If I had not held phenomena such as these to be at least possible, I should not have accepted the invitation to investigate in this instance. And I should not now think it worth while to write this letter if I thought that all spiritualistic phenomena had occurred under conditions such as these, and that all reporters of them had avoided a tendency to crude realism, and the contamination of too near an approach to vulgar fact, as effectually as Mr. Theobald has done.

Mr. Podmore has shown me Mr. Theobald's letter which appeared in "LIGHT" of the 28th February, and while fully agreeing with all that he has said, I do not think he has laid sufficient stress on the indications of Mr. Theobald's incapacity for the scientific investigation of this class of phenomena.

Before paying our visit to Mr. Theobald last May—Mr. Theobald's inaccuracy appears in his mis-statement of the date—we carefully went through Mr. Theobald's letters to "LIGHT" of March and April, and selected for particular inquiry and examination those manifestations which, as recorded, appeared to furnish the most conclusive tests.

Your readers will, on comparing these letters with Mr. Podmore's exposition of the result of our inquiry, perceive how inaccurate and misleading Mr. Theobald has been in his description of the phenomena.

We had a further illustration of this inaccuracy during our visit. Mr. Theobald told us, in his daughter's absence, that she had seen a breakfast tray going upstairs without human agency. Miss Theobald, however, subsequently stated, in answer to our inquiry, that all she had seen, on turning her head at the servant's exclamation of surprise, was the tray balanced on a stair, and swaying slightly, a movement which, I need hardly point out, might have been due to its having been hastily deposited on the stairs in a state of unstable equilibrium.

The minute writing is, I think, a most fallacious and unsatisfactory test. Both Mr. Podmore and myself have written with ease and rapidity over twelve lines to an inch, and Mr. Podmore has legibly written the first twenty lines of Mr. Theobald's letter in "LIGHT" on a bit of paper 1½ in. in breadth, 2½ in. in length. When Mr. Theobald can produce spirit writing of equal clearness and fineness he will be justified in stigmatising the strictures made by Mr. Podmore and endorsed by myself, as inaccurate. But unless he can do this, I am, I think, justified in calling upon him to publicly withdraw and apologise for the entirely unwarrantable remarks that he has made on our criticism.

Mr. Theobald's argument in column 2, page 98 of "LIGHT," on the publication in "LIGHT" of June 14th of the test of the locked secretaire, ignores altogether that the "publication" spoken of was a "republication," in identical language, of the account given in a number of "LIGHT" issued before our visit. If the word "republication" is substituted in Mr. Theobald's argument, the argument collapses.

The strength of Mr. Theobald's reply to our criticism consists not so much in the defence of the evidence assailed, as in the production of further evidence of the same quality.

The obvious answer to this line of argument is, that when Mr. Theobald originally stated his case, and an investigation was made, the case entirely broke down, and that until opportunities have been given of a similar examination of the additional evidence which he has now brought forward, we can hardly regard that evidence as having any value.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XIX.

The faith cures of Major Peirson, of the Salvation Army, in the Potteries, have, for a wonder, been published in nearly all the newspapers. This very much enlarges our outlook. The ice is broken, and we may expect that other facts of an extraordinary character will have similar publicity. It is not impossible, for example, that the most enterprising of interviewers, the Pall Mall Gazette, may instruct its representative to investigate Psychography, on the return of Mr. Eglinton from Vienna. Why not try for a message from General Gordon in his own handwriting, to be produced in the Pall Mall Gazette? The public is quite ready for more enterprise in this direction.

Newspapers that chronicle the miracles of healing wrought in the Salvation Army and the Bethshan of Liverpool or Islington, that record and comment upon Mr. Gladstone's slate-writing investigations, have prepared the public for more striking and important intelligence in the same direction. Why may not a weekly newspaper have its column of spiritual phenomena? One of the largest and best, Mr. Cowen's Weekly Chronicle, makes supra-mundane facts an almost constant feature. We do not despair of seeing them discussed in The World, and Truth, The Spectator, and Saturday Review.

"There is more money in Bibles than in anything else," says one of the largest Bible printers in the United States; wherefore he does not care to print other books. And what is the charm of the Bible but its miracles—its Spiritualism? There is fine poetry and grand eloquence in the Prophets and Psalms; but the real fascination of the book is in its record of spirit manifestations. The curious thing is that people who reverently read about the plagues of Egypt, and the miracles of the forty years in the Wilderness are the bitterest persecutors of those who give us visible proofs that "miracles" do happen.

Spiritualism will reform our funerals. It is doing so already. The black trappings are thrown aside, and we cover our coffins with flowers. We think less of the decaying body; more of the freed spirit that lives—more alive because of the transition to a higher plane of being. So far from death being dreadful, our danger is that we shall be too ready to welcome it, and too unwilling to bide our time and do our work in this world and for it. We are too careless of health. We do not make enough of this stage of being. There can be no doubt that a good life here, which is naturally also a long life, renders us ripe for the life or lives to come.

Death is so different a thing to Spiritualists. All the terror has left it—all the horror! Our friends have only passed through the gate that is ready to admit us. Beyond it is joy. Why sorrow here? Why not rejoice with those who do rejoice? Why not a song of triumph for the departing soul, instead of the "Dead March in Saul"? Why not congratulation rather than lamentation? Can any Christian really be sorry that a friend has gone to Heaven? Certainly no Spiritualist should regret that one we love has attained to a higher sphere of life.

Miss Dale Owen, who gave us such a fervent address at the conversazione at St. James's Hall the other night, on "The Development of Mediumship," made an eloquent appeal for health, purity, and all the Christian virtues. Those who seek the higher gifts "must refrain from tea, coffee, tobacco, alcohol, and tight-lacing." Dr. Wyld thought we might take "the cup that cheers but not inebriates" in moderation; and when Mr. A. A. Watts, as deputy-president, announced that the refreshments were ready, the crowd around the tea and coffee urns was scarcely complimentary to Miss Owen!

It must be said, however, that Miss Owen is not alone in her theory and practice. One of the best mediums I have ever known, with remarkable clairvoyant and healing powers, religiously refrained from narcotics and flesh. At one period during his development and when he was exhibiting his highest power as a medium, Mr. E. Eglinton was held by his guides to a similar asceticism, and loud raps came upon the table when he yielded to any temptation to break the rule.

That a pure, healthy, unexhausted body is favourable to spirit influence and control there can be no question. The lives and works of ascetics in all ages have given abundant proof of this. The John Baptists have worn camel's hair and eaten "locusts and wild honey." Beef, brandy, and tobacco are not necessities of life, nor specially favourable to the development of spiritual gifts and graces. Vegetarians, teetotallers, and anti-narcotisers have a good deal to say for themselves; but they have also an up-hill work in fighting against the customs and habits of civilisation.

If Miss Owen were the fervent apostle of health and purity, holding her audience spell-bound, and constraining many to say "thou almost persuadedst me," the hero of the gathering was Mr. Husk, the wonderful blind medium, who went all over the Banqueting Hall, surrounded by eager groups, who examined the solid iron ring placed upon his wrist by the spirits some weeks before, which everyone could see had never passed over his hand. There is no mistake about the fact. Surgeons and engineers are agreed that it never passed his hand, and could not be welded where it is. Either the iron passed through the wrist or the wrist through the iron. There the ring, made for and marked by Dr. Wyld, remained, and was examined by hundreds.

It is no new fact. The "passing of matter through matter" has been one of the oldest facts in spirit manifestation. It is recorded in the Gospels. It occurs at every séance with a good physical medium. In slate-writing it is force acting through matter, or within the space between two slates enveloped and firmly bound together. "The well-known laws of nature" are constantly violated. I who write these words have tested these "miracles" scores of times through more than thirty years of careful observation.

"There are forces in nature which we know very little about," said Mr. Gladstone, and then his attention was called off by the "Hero of Heroes" preparing for his martyrdom at Khar-toum—a Spiritualist in his way, who was so assured of the reality of a life to come, that death had for him no terrors—everything to hope and nothing to fear. And those who examined the iron ring on Mr. Husk's wrist the other night came to the same conviction as that of Mr. Gladstone, who, a little further on, with no Mahdi to bother him, may find time to make further investigations.

And what has that venerable Royal Society to say about the forces in nature or the dimensions of space, by means of which a chair can be threaded on my arm, or an iron ring placed upon the wrist or neck of a medium; by which a human form, visible, palpable, walking, talking, as real as you yourself are real, is formed in your presence, before your eyes, from a little vaporous cloud? "Forces in nature!" Yes, Mr. Gladstone! Yes, venerable F.R.S.'s!

Punch thinks the mesmerism in the programme of Mr. Verbeck, at Prince's Hall, is a mistake, and that he had better stick to his really marvellous prestidigitation. I agree with Punch this time. When a man spends an hour in showing how adroitly he can deceive you, what is to hinder you from thinking he is still engaged in the same occupation? No, the mesmerism does not explain the sleight of hand tricks, but the tricks go far to explain the mesmerism.

"The Occult World" appears to be looking up just now," says the magnanimous Pall Mall Gazette, and it suggests that the Prime Minister, after declaring his open-mindedness as to Spiritualism, some years ago in the Brighton letter, and then recently witnessing the phenomenon of slate-writing with Mr. Eglinton, should do what is needful to prevent honest mediums from being prosecuted as "rogues and vagabonds."

Look at it! It may be a small matter in comparison with the plagues of Egypt, and the horrors of a summer in the Soudan, but the utter inconsistency of the thing is worthy of the attention of not only the Prime Minister, but both Houses of Parliament, several members of which are noted Spiritualists; for Mr. Eglinton, if paid his customary honorarium for that wonderful séance, could have been prosecuted next day, and on Mr. Gladstone's evidence sent to prison for three months.

Several members of the Royal Family, it is well known, have had séances with different mediums—and thereby become confederates in all the roguery and vagabondage of Spiritualism—another good reason why the law should be enforced or repealed. So acute a statesman as Mr. Gladstone should see in a twinkling that if the Prince of Wales, or even the Home Secretary, should commit a burglary, it would be necessary either to punish the offender, or to repeal the law.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I do not desire to enter into a controversy about Mr. Eglinton, but I think it desirable to inform your various correspondents that I, and some other members of the Society for Psychical Research, arranged a series of séances with him about a year ago, which we finally discontinued because we obtained practically no phenomena of any sort. The circle was not officially appointed by the Society, but it was arranged at the request and with the assistance of the leading members of it. No conditions of any sort were imposed on Mr. Eglinton, and during the later sittings the circle was varied in accordance with his suggestions.—I am, sir, yours &c.,
London, March 5th, 1885. EDW. R. PEASE.

Miracles.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am sure that any further protraction of the discussion on miracles between "W.N." and me would be profitless. We evidently move in different argumentative orbits. There are, however, in his letter two scientific points raised which are so entirely new to me that I am anxious to obtain further enlightenment respecting them. It appears from your correspondent's dicta that (1) Water is no assistance in supporting a man's weight; and (2) that "a zone" may be properly termed "a universe."—Yours, &c.,

London, March 7th, 1885.

SATURDAY, MARCH 14TH, 1885.

THE REAL AND THE IMITATION.

If any person unacquainted with gems, who had seen the diamonds of some lady, and had been told that these were worth many thousands of pounds, were taken to Paris and shown the imitation diamonds so plentifully displayed in the shops of that city, he would undoubtedly say that there was no difference between the two. Having come to this conclusion, he might be informed that the Paris diamonds might be purchased for half as many francs as the English diamonds were said to be worth pounds. Such a statement would probably cause this person to assert that the English lady, who considered her diamonds of such value, was either an impostor or a fool. This person would probably, if somewhat self-sufficient, declare that there was no difference whatever between the English and Paris diamonds, and even if placed side by side one could not tell one from the other. To a mere superficial and casual observer, there would probably be no difference. The person who could at a glance tell the difference would be a man who had dealt with precious stones during many years. We should not select as a judge on such a matter a great mathematician, or a skilful jockey, or an able astronomer; any one of these would probably make as great a mistake as would the most ignorant examiner. Even admitting that a person has a powerful mind and large perception, yet he could not tell the difference between the real and imitation, except after long training and experience. This principle holds good in every matter. Men who have long studied and examined a subject become fitted to judge of it, but their experience on one subject does not qualify them to at once decide on another, of which they have no knowledge. It would be considered great audacity if the trainer of a race-horse, who could tell to a day when this horse was fit to run, were to venture an opinion on the truth or falsity of an astronomical problem, and it would be equally as presumptuous for the astronomer to offer an opinion about the condition of a horse, or to assert that certain brilliant stones were all alike. There is one subject, however, which requires probably longer and more careful study than any which has ever been presented to human beings, but, which the history of the last two score years proves, is one on which nearly every individual assumes he is capable of giving a positive opinion, even offhand, and with little or no examination. This subject is spiritual phenomena. No matter who or what the individual may be, or what his previous training may have been, he yet considers he is capable of giving an infallible judgment. We have an orthodox Churchman asserting that the phenomena are the work of the devil, that it is the object of the devil to convince men there is a second state of existence. Certain men of so-called science assert that when tables rise in the air, and inanimate objects float about the room, these effects are caused by unconscious pressure of the hands, although the hands of all present are several feet from the moving objects. Other individuals, who are neither clerical nor scientific, and who are equally as innocent of ever having examined the subjects, assert, with the boldness of ignorance, that a cardsharp who performs the three-card trick, or a thimble-rigger, does exactly the same things as are said to occur in the presence of a medium.

"I will prove to you that they are not the same," says the person who has investigated, and he would be making a statement similar to that which a jeweller would make who wanted to prove that diamonds and paste were not the same.

"How will you prove to me that these two stones are not the same?" inquires the sceptic.

"By the difference in specific gravity and cleavage," replies the jeweller.

"That will be no proof to me," replies the sceptic.

"Then I will take at random a dozen jewellers, and test the stones in their presence and before you."

"That, of course, I could not allow," says the sceptic. "All these jewellers are prejudiced, and of course could not give an unbiassed opinion. Let me select twelve men who have never before seen a diamond, and then see if you can prove to them, by your specific gravity and cleavage, that the two stones are different. What can you prove by the difference in weight? Many things exactly alike in every other respect differ in weight, and as to cleavage, why the way things break is a mere accident or coincidence. It proves how weak your evidence is, when you object to allow me to decide the question by the aid of twelve men who have never seen a diamond."

Now what do these facts prove? They prove that the mental powers of all such persons are of a very feeble description.

Here is one man who asserts that when solid objects rise in the air, or move without contact, the cause is unconscious pressure of the hands. Another informs us that the absolute proof of an existence after death is the work of the devil. Another person claims that the facts occurring with mediums are exactly the same as those produced by a conjurer. Another man attends a séance—nominally to investigate; he breaks all the conditions necessary to obtain results, ignores the few facts which in spite of everything do occur, and from this one superficial examination writes an account of his assumed investigation, and arrogantly asserts that every one present except himself was a fool, or a trickster. This person has boldly stated his opinion of those who were present; it might be interesting to him to know the opinion formed of his mental capacity by those who were witnesses of his supposed system of scientific examination.

There are a few facts stated on the best evidence to occur, such as inanimate objects moving without contact. The formation of fruit, flowers, human hands, human bodies, &c., from apparently nothing. The production of writing between closed slates, of writing produced on a sheet of paper in a locked box, of noises in various parts of a room, giving, by a system of signalling, intelligent messages, the passage of matter through matter, as exhibited in various ways, and other similar phenomena. On these facts being mentioned to another teacher of science, he states that he does not consider them worthy of attention. Even if they were all true, they would possess no interest for him.

What a vast mind must this man possess, and what grand subjects he must be studying to be able to feel that these possess no interest for him. What can be the subjects which possess so much more interest than those referred to above?

But what do these things teach us? They teach us that the minds of certain men are in all ages very similar. The men who ridiculed and abused Galileo; who hooted at Bruce when he asserted there was an animal termed a giraffe, with a neck seven feet long; who sneered at the telegraph being ever likely to supersede the old semaphore; who called Stephenson a visionary, Mesmer an impostor, Jenner a quack, and chloroform a cruelty, are now as busy as ever denying facts, refusing to investigate, except under their own conditions, vaunting their opinions as more valuable than evidence, and yet setting themselves before the public as the great authorities and inspired teachers of all truth, and all Nature's laws. Surely it is time that their special subjects and theories should be examined by minds of a more able and philosophical type.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

II.—SPIRIT-LIGHTS.

The light represented in Fig. 9 is, in most cases, of a whitish blue; sometimes it is of a brighter blue, with a tendency to purple. Similar lights may be noticed suddenly in the vicinity of the medium's head, where they remain stationary for several seconds, leaving, when fading away, a short after-glow of a very intense, often fierce, red colour. Such an after-glow, by its reddish vapour, is not at all unlike some kinds of artificial light seen at a distance; and often it is bright enough to make surrounding objects faintly visible. But the strange characteristic of this after-glow is that, as a luminary, it is far more powerful than the original "spark" itself, for the latter never casts any light of sufficient strength to render even the nearest object visible. It is probable that in this brilliant spark (like Fig. 8) we observe in reality but the radiation of a very minute point of an exceedingly powerful sort of light, just as in the heavens we see but the radiation of the luminaries called stars, and not their real surface; for the refractory action of the telescope reduces them to mere points. And the fact that the after-glow is the more luminous of the two, may be attributed to the diffusion of its luminiferous properties in space. The luminous crystal-like object placed inside the hand in Plate II. will be described when dealing with that subject.

In addition to the spirit-lights figured, there remain several others to which, pending eventual representation, I will now briefly allude.

(1) Yellow-coloured, globular lights, apparently taken by the "spirits" from the heads of the sitters. Unlike the former, which proceed, if not from the medium's organism, at least from his or her direct vicinity, they, on the contrary, move from a distance towards the medium. This I have witnessed occasionally at séances with Mr. Husk. These lights, once liberated, travel directly in a direction towards, and seem to be absorbed by, the medium. The "spirits," who abstract and guide these lights, inform us that this is the process of collecting "power" visibly. I will give a more elaborate description of this process on a future occasion.

(2) Small Sparks produced by merely rubbing the hands, which are, in all appearance, like the sparks that may be obtained by friction from a glass-tube rubbed over a cat's back. However, such electric sparks can only be obtained from certain persons present. They possess nothing "spiritual" in their nature, but are said to serve as a supply of "power" to assist the "invisibles" in their various manifestations. After appearing over the hands, they begin to hover like little flying insects, and proceed as though guided by intelligent power, in a direction towards the medium, and, once arrived at their destination, disappear.

(3) Meteoric Lights.—These are always seen overhead, and move in a circular or semi-circular line. When exploding, or bursting, whole showers of little sparks of different colours can be noticed.

(4) Luminous Flames, resembling phosphorescent emanations; but of a more intense bluish hue. They are either stationary or move slowly in different—mostly upward—directions. At times, they will expand into large, faintly-luminous clouds or mists.

(5) Luminous Clouds.—These appear in close proximity to the medium, are more voluminous, and less phosphorescent or flame-like than the former (4). They are seen to develop from a faintly discernible mist into a large cloudy mass, which, after assuming certain dimensions, disappears from view.

These clouds may have some analogy with the supposed incipient stages of a "materialisation," visible in a subdued light. They may be a still more primitive stage of this same phenomenon, and cannot be seen except in total darkness.

(6) Glow and Vapours.—Amongst other mysterious occurrences in the dark séance-room, one may, at times, witness strange glows or mists which appear unexpectedly and in some very unaccountable manner. No actual luminary can be discovered; yet, objects or even whole parts of the room will become visible, i.e., dimly illuminated as though enveloped in whitish vapours. Sometimes these glows will travel forward and return to their starting point. They often precede the appearance of a "form" carrying its own light.

Magnetic Flames.—Some persons whom we will for the occasion call "clairvoyants" see, or profess to see, bluish flames surrounding the medium's head or hands, or to move over the table, i.e., the centre of the circle. I have no personal experience of similar magnetic (?) phenomena, but I do not consider it an impossibility for some peculiar organisations to be affected by certain forces in operation, which to them produce the impression of a light being actually present. Perhaps the light is actually there; in which case a photographic experiment might be introduced with advantage. Reichenbach's experiments, repeated by the Society for Psychical Research, tend to prove that to some "sensitives" the poles around the electro-magnet appear like bluish flames. It is not unlikely that analogous forces may be in active operation during a séance, and if so, that to some highly sensitive persons these "flames" are as much a reality as the sun or moonlight is to us.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—At the Council Meeting held March 6th, Mr. A. A. Watts in the chair, the secretary reported eight applications for membership. The treasurer reported that he had received a considerable number of the annual subscriptions, but that there were still about 70 members who had not yet remitted. He thought they would probably send their subscriptions without a second application. A few members, in response to the president's announcement that subscriptions were not limited to a guinea, had increased the amount of their subscription, but he regretted to say that they were very few.

IMPROMPTU REPLIES THROUGH A LADY PSYCHIC OF VERY LIMITED EDUCATION.

II.

By T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

Séance No. 5, held on Monday evening, AUGUST 16TH, 1875. Present—the medium and six gentlemen.

QUESTION. What is the difference between the harmonics of an eight feet open organ pipe and a four feet stopped pipe?

ANSWER. In open pipes the first node is found at the centre of the pipe; the first harmonic overtone is thus found $\frac{1}{2}$ between the first node and the mouthpiece, others following $\frac{1}{3}$, $\frac{1}{4}$, $\frac{1}{5}$, $\frac{1}{6}$. In closed pipes the end forms the corresponding node to the first one in the centre of the open one; the reflected wave forms the first node at a distance of $\frac{1}{4}$ from the end, and the others following $\frac{3}{4}$, $\frac{5}{4}$, $\frac{7}{4}$, &c.

Q. If a small hole be made in an eight feet open pipe exactly at half length, what effect would be produced? Would the pitch of the pipe be altered? and how?

A. As pitch depends on the rapidity of the vibrations, I do not see that it would be in any way affected.

Q. If in a stopped pipe the hole be made at half length, would it affect the pitch, and to what extent?

A. The pitch would not be affected, but the length of the wave would be shortened by half.

Q. In making reed organ pipes there are single notes that cannot be made to speak correctly without having a small hole bored in what is termed the boot of the pipe. Why is this?

A. Because in organ pipes the sound is made to, or I mean the air is made to, vibrate, by issuing from a small slit and striking on a sharp cutting edge. This should be done in every case. I don't know why in reed organs alone, since it would be an advantage in every case.

Q. There are some pipes that require a hole in the boot in order to bring them into harmony or tune. Will you please to state the names of the pipes that require this hole in order to their being in proper tune?

A. This is what I never heard before; if one pipe require a hole bored in it to bring it into harmony with the others, it shows a fault in the mechanism of the whole concern.

Q. How is it that when G and E of the treble clef are sounded there is a resultant note heard which is the lower C of the bass clef?

A. Because the resultant sound heard is the harmonic of both G and E blended, but you are mistaken in thinking it the C of the bass clef; it may partake of that sound, but it is the C of the lower treble clef and its overtone, which, travelling over a greater distance, and sound varying inversely as the square of the distance increases, deceives the ear, it being too faint to be properly judged.

Q. What in your opinion is the origin of harmony?

A. I will revert the question. What is the difference between harmony and noise? Will that do, seeing that the other question is vague? The difference between harmony and noise is this: that the waves of sound reach the ears in isochronous vibrations; music or harmony is the result. When, however, the vibrations are not sufficiently rapid, the ear is only conscious of noise. When again the vibrations are too rapid, the ear is not conscious of any sound at all.

Q. I have an impression that the present recognised number of appreciable vibrations is sixteen for the lowest, and 32,000 for the highest. You will be aware that there is an instrument called a syren, which gives vibrations that are both below and above the power of the human ear to hear; the lowest is, I think, sixteen, and the highest 32,000 per second.

A. You are speaking of De la Tours' experiments, are you not? Now I prefer the experiments with Savart's wheel, but unless the punctures in the syren are perfectly regular, which I doubt very much, as I have never seen one that could be trusted, the vibrations will be very irregular, but of the numbers I cannot say positively.

Q. Now that we are much interested in the information you have given us, we are particularly anxious to know whether Humnur Stafford is your real name, or only a nom-de-plume; and we are desirous of knowing to what country you belonged, and where you obtained your scientific training?

A. Humnur Stafford are my two middle names, and I prefer not to give any others. I was born and brought up for the first thirteen years in America; came over to Europe, and entered a university in Germany; went back to America in my twenty-first year, and was an invalid from that time from an accident I received by being thrown from my horse. I studied quietly during the next nine years of my earthly life, and came over here when just completing my thirtieth year.

Q. Will you oblige by informing us what your feelings were in changing from this world to that you now inhabit, and if you have discovered that the opinions commonly held in this world as to the condition of your world, or the spiritual world, are correct; and if not correct in what way do they differ from those commonly held?

A. These questions require answers that would occupy the whole evening, and I shall be happy to tell you more of the subjects you ask. I may tell you, however, that the only feeling I experienced on just leaving my worn-out body, was one of such intense, intoxicating pleasure, freedom from pain, and restfulness, that I tell you it was worth a lifetime of pain to experience.

Q. Will you be kind enough to appoint a night for the purpose of giving us the information which you have promised in the above paragraph, and if you have time and are disposed to answer the following question we should feel obliged to you. It is in relation to light, a subject with which, I infer from your previous remarks, you are very familiar. What is meant by chromatic and spherical aberration, and how are these two difficulties in the construction of optical instruments overcome in the microscope?

A. I will meet you at any time you appoint. I am not so well acquainted with optics as you imagine, and will have to study a little, or rather rake my memory over, to be able to answer your question, but I have no doubt I shall be able to give you every satisfaction, since I certainly studied that branch of science, but have let it go down since, having no further use for it. It is only since I have been acquainted with you that the thoughts of these sciences have occurred to me. I will meet you on Monday next, and will tell you of our state here as much as I may, but you must not expect too much, for our state here is beyond description. Such words as can best explain our condition I will use, but as far as I can judge, the English language is not in such a state of perfection that one can describe things celestial.

The next séance was held on Monday evening, August 23rd, 1875, and nearly the whole evening was devoted to questions and answers on the conditions of life in the future world. The report of the séance is too long for insertion this week, but the MS. will be forwarded for your next issue.

I desire to remind your readers that the foregoing answers are written answers in reply to questions which, before being asked, were unknown to anyone but myself, that many of them were impromptu questions which occurred to me at the instant of asking, that the lady medium wrote the replies instantly after the questions were asked, and that I have the original MSS.

I may further remark that the lady medium has no practical or theoretical knowledge of music, and does not play upon any musical instrument.

MISS ROSAMOND DALE OWEN AT THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

Thursday, February 26th, 1885.

Miss R. Dale Owen introduced the lecture by saying that she made no apology on account of the personal character of the address, for the reason that the experiences she was about to give were such as might come to any man or woman; hence they were of a typical rather than of a personal character.

She also stated that she had neglected to send a synopsis to the Council of the Alliance; and, on hearing of the nature of the address she had intended giving, called "Where Spiritualism has Led Me," the committee preferred that another should be substituted, entitled Spirits as Mentors.

"Some three years ago," said Miss Owen, "an unusual spiritual influx came to me, such as comes to many at some period of their lives. The spirit friends told me that they wished to impart certain deeper truths, which they were unable to do unless the body was prepared by hygienic living for the transmission of these revelations to the inner woman. As this tentative period extended over a number of months, it is impossible to give more than a few salient points in a half-hour's talk. The voice which speaks to me, such a voice as spoke to Socrates, and such as has spoken to many from that day to the present—this voice proceeded to explain in detail the preparation which was required. An entire change of dress was instituted, 'For,' said the voice, 'the blood is the life, and if it cannot circulate freely, the body cannot be cleansed from impurity, and truth undefiled cannot be transmitted through an unclean conductor.' Walking and daily exercise within doors were also advised. Then it was urged that I must abstain from all narcotics or stimulants, such as tea, coffee, and meat, so that the nervous system could become perfectly natural. It is impossible to convey a message to the spirit with subtle accuracy, so my voice averred, except the nerves be absolutely healthful in action; and it is impossible for them to be normal under the system of stimulation usual in the present day. That it is a false stimulation, and not true energy, may be realised from the fact that one who uses tea, coffee, tobacco, or liquor habitually is restless or dispirited when these are discontinued. There is a reaction which does not occur when an article of unstimulating food is withdrawn—when a meal is served without potatoes, for instance. This constant vibration between an artificially created exhilaration and the consequent depression, slight though it may be, is destructive to accurate transfer of thought between the two worlds,—as destructive as a seemingly trifling defect in a telegraph wire. We realise how perfect are the conditions required in the physical world when dealing with the finer forces, but we do not so clearly see how much more subtly stringent are the demands of spiritual science. I do not wish to dogmatise, and declare that all must do precisely as I have done; but I would like to give my testimony that, after three years' experience, I have found the advice good; not only has it enabled my guides to illumine my spirit more clearly, but my bodily health is much improved, as I am now enabled to sleep eight or nine hours as soundly as a child, without waking, and I have known the happiness of living for mere living's sake as I have never done before. We have almost forgotten, in our over-strained civilisation, what it is to be glad of life; the joy of being alive is fast becoming one of the lost arts.

"It may be objected that there are many who become good mediums without such great care. This is true, but in considering the subject of mediumship we should clearly define the difference between what may be called normal and abnormal mediumship. Many sensitives belong to the second class. Mediums as a rule are martyrs suffering for the materialism of the present day. Calvin is indirectly responsible for the fact that Charles Foster is in the insane asylum. The rebound from the intolerance of the popular theology, from that dogmatism which required that a man should profess to believe that which the best instinct within him rejected—this rebound has necessitated the modern phase of mediumship.

"Men have come to doubt everything except that which they can touch, and hear, and see; hence a religion is needed which rests, not on faith, but on experiment; and this requirement can only be met in one way; namely, through the various phases of mediumship common in the present day. But true religion makes us healthier in body and happier in mind, and if these results are not brought about, the religion is not one which can endure, for only the creative can be eternal, the destructive must of necessity bring about nothingness. We are aware that the present phases of mediumship are often harmful to those possessing them, the least fatal effect being a temporary depletion of vital force. There are other results far more serious than this, as many know who are acquainted with the histories of some of our best mediums.

"Many object to Spiritualism on the ground that the gift of mediumship is confined only to a few; why cannot all have this power? My answer is that all may have it in its normal phase if they are willing to accept the conditions; the first requisite being to persevere in the physical preparation I have described; and the second, that we shall never forget to aspire, fervently and prayerfully, turning neither to the right nor left for worldly fame, or wealth, but steadily persevering until we see the light shining clear upon the heights. God has never yet clogged feet that were climbing upward; He has never thrust back pleading hands reaching after the Infinite; He has never denied lips which yearned for truth, nor has He refused to illumine eyes which sought for clear vision.

"Every man has a spiritual as well as a natural body; hence every man must have spiritual eyes and ears as well as physical eyes and ears. Therefore, clairaudience and clairvoyance must be possible to every human being; and it rests with each of us to hasten the day when we shall see and hear that which is invisible to the senses of flesh. We have power, now and here, to throw off the lethargy which has held us in thrall, blind, and deaf. We have clogged the conduits to the soul; let us remove the encumbrances and let in the light of the full day. If the answer does not come, then we may know that we have not as yet done our uttermost; God requires, for the sake of our own development, that we shall do our uttermost. If there be even so much as a hair's breadth left untraversed, which we have the strength to pass, we have not earned the right to ask for help from without.

"The usual form of mediumship known in the present is a special gift to meet a special need, and it beloves those of us who no longer require such aid to remember that we should not linger over this elementary, experimental phase; for we have a long way before us. The beginning is here; the ending reaches into eternity. This way is one we must all follow sooner or later, for it leads to God of Whom we are a part.

"The next lesson to be learned was of a somewhat different character. My voice said that one of the radical defects of this world was that scarcely anyone had as yet learned how to work. Motion is the underlying principle not only of earth but of Heaven. To spread the broad pinions of our strength, and sweep the skies with untiring energy—that is bliss. Not acquiescence, but harmonised activity brings everlasting peace. The din-worn ear is soothed far more by the fulness of all sweet accord than through the emptiness of silence. The tired heart is weary not because of the fulness of life, but because of its emptiness. Hence no cessation of living, no inertia, can bring us rest.

"Our labour wearies us because we work injudiciously. If we bring more energy or less energy to bear upon a given work than is needed to produce a given result, there must be more or less friction. We in America expend enough force to build another country as large as our own, and have enough to spare for an island or two; the consequence is that the very air is surcharged with it. This is so wrought into one's system that I, for one, shall have to live to be an old woman, I fear, before I can work as my guides wish me to work. Their advice took a most practical shape. One day I was dusting a room with my usual haste; when I had finished I sat down quite out of breath. 'This is all wrong,' said my voice; 'begin again and we will show you how to dust'; then I was told how to handle each article deftly but not hurriedly, stopping an instant to enjoy the result of my labour as I put back each piece of furniture. 'You have driven life before you; learn now to take it into your heart and live it lovingly. Heaven itself would become hell filled with the unrest of haste,' said my guide.

"Many thoughts have been unfolded to me on this important subject, but upon these I cannot linger at present.

"About this time my guides bade me go to a church familiarly known as 'the little church around the corner.' This church, the most peaceful, the holiest place I have ever entered, is open to all; waifs and strays find as warm a welcome as the outwardly respectable; the doors stand wide open during the week as well as on Sundays. I gradually fell into the habit of spending half-an-hour there between daylight and dark.

"One evening, as I sat alone, a strange vision appeared to me. A shining form approached, advancing down the aisle. I have seen many sweet faces and pure forms, but none so illumined as was this angel; my heart filled with joy at the beautiful vision, but as the presence approached, I discerned a sharp knife in one hand, and I knew it was a symbol showing me that I was to suffer and not rejoice. Through the twilight into the night I knelt, and over me bent the angel. I have heard that drowning men remember with vividness the minute details of the life that is passed; so was it with me, from my earliest childhood up to that night, not only all that I had ever done, but all that I had ever thought, was laid bare; not only my actions but my motives, deep-hidden from myself as well as from others, rose and confronted me. The ordeal was almost more than I could bear. I knew in that hour what it will be to stand with uncovered soul, stripped of all outward disguise, naked and ashamed, searched by the swift light of truth. I had believed that I had tried to be a good woman, but in the face of this new requirement, my most earnest endeavour seemed puerile indeed.

"I realised for the first time how great is the responsibility of this generation. Thought-transference is more than a scientific fact; it is a tremendous moral requirement. If the prayer, 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven,' is to be answered, the line dividing the finite from the infinite must be shifted again and again, and at each remove more of Heaven and Heaven's law must be received upon earth. In the days of savage life men lived almost entirely in the objective, and they were responsible only to God and themselves for their emotions. But as we rise higher and higher, the veil of flesh is more transparent, and the subjective has more forceful expression. The spiritual being the cause, and the external or physical being the effect of that cause, it is clear that as we approach nearer to Him Who is the first great Cause we shall come to have a deeper responsibility. In the days of yore, a man was only accountable to his fellow man for his actions, the underlying emotion or cause not being perceived unless expressed by word or act. But in this day, an unexpressed spasm of hate, if directed towards a sensitive, may have the force of a blow. The swiftness and subtlety of transfer in the external world through the telegraph, telephone, &c., is but the reflection of a change far more momentous in the psychical sphere. As was shown me by the angel on the night of my probation, a man or woman uttering no false word, doing no evil deed, may, in this day, poison the atmosphere of a home, of an assembly, aye, of a nation, by the swift and silent transfer of evil thought, of impure being. Both the physical and psychical motive power of this generation becomes more effective as it grows more intangible. The ponderable is yielding to the imponderable, and how tremendous is the increase of personal responsibility which the change must bring as the ever-shifting line of demarcation between the two worlds leaves more of spiritual law upon the earth-ward side. Truly the prayer is being answered 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven.' With each generation the requirement widens.

"The last preparation asked of me was that I should go out every day and search every face that I met until I found a sign of the God-like germ inherent in every soul. I was told that if I looked lovingly into the meanest countenance I should discover that for which I looked. A number of weeks passed before I was enabled to obey this mandate. Many times I returned quite wearied with my new task; but in time I found that even in the sin-lined faces of the most wicked, one could discover a trace of good, perhaps no more than the tremor of an upraised eye-lid, the quiver of a lip, but enough to make one feel that the most abandoned wretch is the child of God, and that the day will come when the god-like within must answer to the God-like above.

"When I had learned this lesson, a further effort was required of me. My voice said: 'We wish you to consider who is the person you think has wronged you most, and when you have decided, we wish you to learn to love that person.'

"This I found to be the most difficult effort I had been asked to make. When I sought to love, my mind dwelt the more upon the wrongs, or fancied wrongs, I had endured; several months passed in this way. When I woke in the morning, my thoughts would return to my task, and I was often driven out of bed at five or six o'clock because I could not keep my bitterness in abeyance, unless I rose and diverted my mind, usually by a walk in the open air; and so I battled until Christmas morning. As I knelt in church, feeling very despondent at my failure, a cry for help went up to my Father in Heaven. The cry was heard, and answered; I had done my uttermost, I think, but my strength was not sufficient, and so God sent me help. When that grand anthem rolled through the church, 'Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men,' my soul was lifted upward; my prayer was answered; a joy was mine such as I had never known before. It is blessed to love our friends, but how infinitely more blessed is it tenderly to take into our hearts those whom we have hated as enemies."

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

The Subjects of "Apparitions" and "Occultism," discussed before the Lancaster Philosophical Society.

On Thursday evening, February 26th, Mr. Thos. Gibson, of Castle Park, read before the Lancaster Philosophical Society a highly-interesting paper on "Apparitions." The Rev. Canon Allen, D.D., presided. Mr. Gibson quoted the opinions of Dr. Johnson and Addison as to the importance of the study of the question of ghosts, as some reason for his asking the audience to spend a short time in a consideration of the subject. The reason why so interesting a topic had met with so little investigation was, that there was, in the minds of most of our great scientific inquirers, a not unnatural tendency to materialism, and they had, therefore, passed by as foolish and superstitious anything which could not well be explained from a materialistic point of view. But in 1851 a society, called the Ghost Club, was established in Cambridge, which formed an extensive collection of authenticated cases as well of remarkable dreams as of apparitions; and their researches resulted in the conviction held by the members that there was ample evidence to prove the existence, from time to time, at about the time of death or after it, of the apparitions of deceased persons. The Psychical Research Society, established some three years ago, went a good deal further than this. That Society had entered into a systematic study of apparitions, had collected many hundreds of cases, had sifted the evidence in support of such cases, and had given the results to the public. More than that, it had up to a certain point come to a conclusion and given its verdict, and had declared and built up a theory which, though not altogether new, had never before been put forward in so prominent a manner. Mr. Gibson cited several of the cases advanced by the Psychical Society, including that of Mr. Richard Searle, barrister, of Home Lodge, Herne Hill, who, while sitting in the Temple working at some papers, saw the apparition of his living wife, who was at that moment luncheon in Gloucester-gardens. Mr. Gibson said that he had, a fortnight ago, called upon Mr. Searle, and cross-examined him upon the subject. Mr. Searle told him that the account was perfectly true, and that without a shadow of a doubt he saw the apparition. Taking the evidence collected by the Psychical Research Society, and adding to it that already put into our possession by other careful inquirers, no other conclusion could be come to, Mr. Gibson said, than that it was now an established fact that at different times apparitions of living persons did appear to others, and frequently when these living persons were at great distances from those to whom the apparitions were presented. Mr. Gibson contended that the opinions of Sir D. Brewster, Abercrombie, and others, to the effect that such apparitions were solely the abnormal creations of the mind that received them, must fall to the ground, for, in many cases, the person who saw the phantasm had his mind intent on something quite different, and the apparition was, as it were, forced upon his attention. Mr. Gibson considered that the Psychical Society's theory that a great number of these phenomena were caused by telepathic impact from the mind of the absent agent to the mind of the percipient, could not account for all the cases to which it ought to be applied; and he was inclined to believe that it was the soul which appeared, and enabled the presence of a person at a long distance from where he was corporeally, to appear to another. "Let it not," said Mr. Gibson, "be objected that these apparitions are very frequently of bodies, and clothed in corporeal dress." If the emancipated soul was what we thought it to be, it would have no difficulty in materialising itself—in assuming such an appearance as to best attract the attention of the person to whom it wished to appear. And if it was asked, "Cui bono?" it was enough to reply that they undoubtedly gave us some idea of an existence different from our present one, and if they afforded even such a trifling proof of our immortality they are most warmly to be welcomed on that account alone.—The same evening the Rev. C. O. L. Riley read before the same Society a paper on "The Occult World." The rev. gentleman gave an elaborate definition of the philosophy and professed powers of the Theosophists, which it is needless, the subject having been dealt with so recently and fully in these columns, for us now to recapitulate. Mr. Riley concluded thus: "Was there anything in this occult philosophy at all? It could be admitted in answer that it was quite possible that it might be found out that mind had more power over matter than we were willing to admit. But if it was asked 'What do you think of these people?' he should say that he thought very little of their sagacity; for if these men had possessed this wonderful knowledge of nature and the great power which this knowledge gave them, was it likely that they would not, in all these centuries, have used this power either for themselves, or for their country, or, in the time of persecution, for their faith, or for humanity at large."

There was a large attendance of members at this unusually interesting meeting of the Society, and much discussion took place on the two papers.—Correspondent.

GLASGOW.—On the subject of "Three Curses and how to cure them," the spirit guides of Mr. Wallis delivered, on Sunday last, one of the most vigorous and telling discourses they have given in Glasgow. Applying themselves first to the consideration whether painful toil, disease, and death were really the curses they were commonly supposed to be, the guides succeeded in showing that these were rather blessings in disguise; not punitive dispensations of an offended Deity, but spiritual purifiers, means for human development, helps to the achievement of "a happier goal." The real curses were Ignorance, Intemperance, and Selfishness. Regarding this unholy trinity as the source and cause of all unhappiness, discord, and crime in the world of human life and relationship, the guides expatiated at length on the direful influence and effects of each of these curses in turn, denouncing the evils which abound in the midst of the most cherished institutions of our civilisation, the sins of our boasted professions, and the tricks of our dishonest trade. The cure was personal righteousness, a pure and firm desire on the part of each individual member of the body corporate of human society to maintain the integrity of his own soul, doing his best to right the wrong his better nature directed him to cope with. Thus, by-and-bye, the evils which were the parents of misery and distress would disappear one by one, and human progress become an accomplished fact. The discourse was eloquent throughout, and abounded in well selected illustrations and striking passages.—A meeting of members of the association was held at the close of the evening service to consider the important question of re-engaging Mr. and Mrs. Wallis for another six months. From the chair, Mr. Robertson (president) moved that the re-engagement of these useful workers was desirable. Mr. Munro seconded the motion, to which the meeting agreed unanimously. The matter of "ways and means" was then contemplated, and it was resolved to send a circular to members and friends soliciting support to the undertaking in the form of a definite promise of a sum, fixed by each individual according to his means or his inclination, and to be paid either weekly or monthly, such sums to form a guarantee fund, supplementary to the ordinary income of the Society. It is earnestly hoped that members, and all who interest themselves in the cause of Spiritualism in Glasgow, will generously respond to this appeal. On March 20th the Society will hold a soirée and social meeting in commemoration of the following objects, viz.: The Thirty-seventh Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Mr. Morse's Farewell Visit, and the termination of the first six months' engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis.—*ST. A STUDENT of mesmerism residing in Camden Town desires to meet with one or two gentlemen interested in the subject for mutual study and practice.

AN investigator into Spiritualism residing in Pinlco desires to correspond with others with a view to forming a regular experimental circle.

It may not be generally known in this country that Baron Hellenbach, who has been instrumental in doing so much good for the cause of Spiritualism in Austria, has published several works upon psychological subjects, the principal of which are entitled "The Philosophy of Common-sense," "The Prejudices of Mankind," "The Magic of Numbers the Basis of all Natural Variations," and "Birth and Death as Forms of Sensibility." We are in hope that some of these works will shortly be rendered into English.

A CORRESPONDENT informs us that Mr. W. Eglinton gave his first séance in Vienna at the house of the Baron Drasche-Wurtemberg, when there were present, in addition to his host, the Baroness Drasche, Prince Auersperg, Baron Hellenbach, Baron Du Prel, and Prince Trautmannsdorff. Great satisfaction was expressed by the members of the circle at the remarkable phenomenon of psychography obtained in full light. We understand that Baron Du Prel, who is an author of considerable repute, intends to treat of his experiments with Mr. Eglinton in a work he is now preparing for the press.

A VISION BY "LILY" ON A GREAT MYSTERY.

In the silence of my chamber, in the stillness of the night, When the fever of life's struggles no longer dims the sight, Then my soul its power grasping and my spirit taking wing Upsoars to Life Supernal, and to thoughts that round it cling.

And thus in meditation, one night not long gone by, On that mystery of mysteries, "The Holy Trinity," Unrolled before my vision was a new translation given In words that glowed as diamonds in the star-lit vault of Heaven.

"Oh, Mortal," thus the message ran—"we now unfold to thee That yet unravelled mystery, 'The Holy Trinity': Our Father-Mother, 'God Supreme,' Wisdom and Love in One, Creative Energy and Power, portrayed in 'God the Son.'"

"From Love Almighty, Love Supreme, conjoined with Wisdom high In equal Majesty, sprang forth Creative Energy; (That power that bade the myriad worlds that meet thy gaze 'To be,' That power that peopled them with forms of life in harmony.)"

"In these behold 'The Trinity' of Father-Mother-Son, Of Wisdom, Love, and Power combined, the Holy 'Three-in-One'; One perfect Whole thus stands revealed to our adoring eye, And thus interpret we to thee 'The Holy Trinity.'"

In awe I gazed; when gradually they faded from my view, Those words of startling import, giving rise to thoughts anew? Then where "The Holy Spirit" of the ancient Three-in-One? Is He from His high place dethroned? His name and glory gone!

And where "The Jesus" of our love? Is He dethroned too? A myth, a symbol only, is He now proclaimed to view? He lost to us for evermore, round whom our heart-strings cling, Our precious Lord and Master, our Brother and our King?

"It cannot be, forbid it, God," in anguish deep I cried; When lo! a gentle Voice in whispering accents by my side Said, "Fear not, Child, but listen while we yet expound to thee Our second lesson gathered from 'The Holy Trinity.'"

"The Father-Mother-Son, the perfect Wisdom, Love, and Power, Know well their children's needs from day to day, from hour to hour; Know well they need a loving Guide, a Guardian to watch o'er Their faltering steps, and lead them on from Shore to brighter Shore.

"And such is Jesus, called 'The Christ,' in Ancient times, as now, 'The Expression' of the Three-in-One, embodied here below As Christna, Buddha, Jesus, born on earth to lead the way To ever clearer, bright Light, unto meridian day.

"And such The Holy Spirit is; 'The Comforter' foretold By Jesus, when on earth He lived some thirty years, of old; 'Twas of Himself He prophesied, that He would ever be, Nearer and ever nearer drawn to our humanity.

"And hath He not His word fulfilled? 'The Comforter' hath been In every hour of need to all who draw near unto Him? Whether as Christna, Buddha, Christ, 'tis still God's 'Holy Son,' God's 'Holy Spirit' sent to earth from God the 'Three-in-One.'"

"'Tis He, the Comforter and Guide, dear Guardian, tender Friend, Who from all time the Mission had, thy Planet, 'Earth,' to tend; 'Tis He, 'The Expression' of our God, incarnate for Earth's weal, In earthly robes of differing forms, but the same Spirit still.

"Know, then, oh child, and understand the lessons taught thee now Of grand and mighty Truths; and may thy Soul and Spirit bow In deep humility before that Wisdom, Love, and Power, That deigns thee knowledge so sublime; a precious, priceless dower."

In awe these wondrous words I heard, flashed to me from above As living Truths upon my Soul, vouchsafed to me in love, And with deep gratitude in prayer and praise, my Soul o'erflowed To Him, The Almighty "Three-in-One," Love, Wisdom, Power,—"God."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates medianimic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH AND SPIRITUALISM.

By EDMUND GURNEY.

The letter of your correspondent "X." in the current number of "LIGHT" seems to call for a few words of comment. These will relate exclusively to his criticism of our past work: with his view as to the importance of other and further investigations, I cordially concur.

He begins by saying that the word "telepathy" is one which we have adopted as expressing our view of "almost all spiritualistic phenomena so-called, so far as the experiments and observations of the Society have been recorded." But the first phenomenon which he adduces as an instance of this is automatic writing; and whatever the rationale of automatic writing may be, telepathy has never been, and never could be, represented as having anything to do with it, unless what is automatically written has distinct reference to the mental content of some second person, whose hands are not in contact with the writing instrument. In these cases, it seems reasonable to infer that the mind of the writer is unconsciously influenced by the other person. The difficulty that may be felt in the fact that the recipient mind is not conscious of the "transferred impression," is not in our view a formidable one; but such as it is, it may be relieved by noting that something similar seems often to take place in cases of spontaneous telepathy. An event happens to the "agent" of which an impression of some sort is conveyed to the "percipient"; but the impression at the moment is an unconscious one, and does not become conscious till, perhaps, some hours afterwards, when quiet, or darkness, or some other condition, favours its emergence. This view of the matter may help to remove "X.'s" next difficulty, as to the occurrence of "an apparition an hour after death." A further criticism which he makes—namely, that "those only can receive 'thought-transference' who are psychics or mediums—that is, those who believe in spirit-communication"—is not in accordance with the evidence. Among the percipients whose records of telepathic experiences are in the Society's possession, there are a very large number who have not held the belief in question.

"X." proceeds to mention some more of the alleged marvels of Spiritualism, and asks whether we consider telepathy to be the explanation of these. I reply, certainly not; nor do we see any more likelihood of being prejudiced in judging of such phenomena by a belief in the reality of telepathy than by a belief in the reality of hypnotism, or of any other order of psychological facts. And even in respect of phantasmal indications of death, as I may remind your readers, "We are far from dogmatically asserting that all of them are of identical nature, or that because thoughttransference explains some of them, it must needs explain all." (Proceedings, Part VI., p. 182.)

"X." goes on to regret, in the interest of subscribers to the Society for Psychical Research, that the Proceedings of the Society must for a long time be largely occupied with telepathic researches. They have been and will continue to be largely occupied with other topics as well. But "X.'s" tone suggests a much more light-hearted view than we can at all share, as to what telepathy and the proof of it really imply. Has he carefully considered the relation of even the humbler forms of thought-transference to recognised science? Has he appraised the weight of the presumption that there is against them? Can he deny that the lifelong devotion of hundreds of workers for generations has been before now expended—and worthily expended—in establishing facts of incomparably less scientific importance than the smallest genuine instance of the direct action of mind on mind? And till the recognition of genuine thought-transference has become a part of orthodox scientific belief, the task of the Society for Psychical Research in that direction will be incomplete. If the task merely consisted, as "X." seems to think, "in bringing some order into the willing-game—so long the amusement of society," his position would be intelligible. But the relation of our work to the results of the "willing-game" has been a purely negative one; we have simply discarded these and all other results where contact was used or physical signs were possible, as having no claim to the name of thought-transference at all. Of our positive results, however unattractive the records of them may be, we can only express a hope that they are still in their infancy.

To the next criticism—that we withhold from our printed reports the views "of the few thinkers who venture to call the telepathic and other conclusions in question"—I can only reply that no paper embodying these views has even been submitted to the Council for presentation to the Society. If such a paper were submitted, it would be judged on its merits like any other.

Finally, "X." describes our view of telepathy as a physiological theory, and identifies it with materialism. As to this, it will perhaps be enough to refer your readers to the Proceedings, Part VI., pp. 134, 135, where the inadequacy of physical explanations and analogies is very strongly set forth; and to p. 184 of the same Part, where it is expressly said that "only in some form of Idealism can the long controversy between Science and Faith find a close." The discussion in which these words occur, and which treats of the relation of psychical research to human faiths and hopes, may be undogmatic enough; but it scarcely seems accurate to describe it as "a form of agnosticism."

March 16th, 1885.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I hope that you will allow me a few lines in reply to my friendly critic "X.," whose letter appears in your last issue.

As regards the practical advice which "X." gives to your readers, I am most thoroughly in accord with him, and am glad to see the request put prominently forward in "LIGHT." "It is to be desired," he says, "that those who can give instances in which automatic writing must have come from external sources, should record them in "LIGHT." To this I would only add that if, as I hope may be the case, these instances should be too numerous and detailed to admit of the reception of all of them in the columns of "LIGHT," I shall be most grateful for any which may be sent to me at my private address, or to the Secretary, Society for Psychical Research, at 14, Dean's-yard, S.W. I must ask in all cases for first-hand testimony, and full details, with names and dates; not, of course, to be published without express authorisation. The interesting case which "X." mentions, where children are said to have written Latin verses automatically, would be specially welcome if thus authenticated. At present it is shrouded behind a triple veil of anonymity, being "X.'s" account of what "Y." said to him as regards the children of "Z."

I may add that I quite agree with "X." that it would have been my duty "to subject the statements of Spiritualists to a very vigorous scrutiny before committing [myself] to a theory which would dispense with all spiritualistic agency, and reduce spiritualistic phenomena so-called to the operation of physical movements altogether." But I may remark in reply, first, that I have explicitly and totidem verbis guarded myself against being supposed to assert that the telepathic theory can be made to cover all alleged spiritualistic phenomena, and secondly, that I have, in fact, scrutinised almost all spiritualistic statements accessible to me with very great care, although it is surely obvious that one cannot say everything at once, and that where all is so strange and novel it is safest to begin at the end which is least remote from established knowledge, and recognised methods of experimentation. As regards the cases of automatic writing alleged to have come from external sources, I may say frankly, as I am thus directly appealed to, that I have no prepossession against the theory, and that I think some of the cases in "M.A. Oxon's" "Spirit Identity" very striking and impressive, but that it seems to me (as it surely must to most people) that there is not as yet nearly enough evidence of this kind to compel the assent of the scientific world. I do not think that any one who realises how slowly and cautiously any new generalisation in the established sciences is built up; how many years, how many treatises, how many observations, are found necessary in order to establish any valid natural law; can maintain that the evidence hitherto offered for spiritualistic manifestations has been at all in proportion to the startling magnitude of the conclusions founded thereon. The question of communication with an invisible world is an enormously more important thing (for instance) than the etiology and treatment of typhoid-fever; yet the literature of typhoid-fever alone would be found, I think, greatly to outweigh, in its accumulation of observation and reasoning, the whole mass of spiritualistic literature. I am not bringing any kind of charge against anyone for this comparative deficiency; but only pointing out that there is still a real need for more evidence, and full scope for the energies of all those who are in a position to attain it. For my part, I wish that ten thousand families would try experiments with planchette, and carefully and minutely report the results. As compared with existing reports on cases of typhoid, that number would still be few; and yet how much more complex is the spiritual than the medical problem!

I must not trespass much further on your space. But I should like to refer "X." and your readers generally to Professor Sidgwick's presidential addresses, as showing how far from hostile, how far from prejudiced, the attitude of the Society for Psychical Research towards Spiritualism really is. Professor Sidgwick's contention, throughout the three brief years of our existence, has been that Thought-transference has now received proof enough to convince us who have investigated it, although we cannot expect the world in general to become convinced without a great deal more proof; but that Spiritualism is still an open question,—still needs more proof to convince not only the outer world but the careful inquirer. We are open to any such proof, and are especially anxious to receive it from private sources. Professor Sidgwick and others have felt that there were grave objections to the employment of the funds of the Society for Psychical Research in paying fees to public mediums; but a private fund has been subscribed for that purpose and many sittings held, though not as yet with conclusive results. Will not private circles offer us opportunities of inquiry?

In a world where it is hard to please everyone there is a melancholy comfort in feeling that at any rate one does not give more dissatisfaction to one side than to the other. When next I see myself described as "a wild mystic, who must inevitably take the fatal plunge into the pit of Spiritualism, with all its stuffed hands, banjos, and nameless abominations," I shall try to console myself by the reflection that "X." considers me as "stranded in Agnosticism" and Mr. Houghton as an adept in the art of "How not to do it."—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

FREDERIC W. H. MYERS.

Leckhampton House, Cambridge,

[If our readers will kindly furnish us with records of phenomena of any description, we will gladly tabulate those that appear suitable for publication in "LIGHT," and pass on any with which we may not be able to deal. Our friends need not fear that we shall be overburdened as regards quantity; we can find room for all accurate narrations of fact. In cases where it is desired that names and addresses shall not be published, we will arrange accordingly, but we hope our friends will not allow this consideration to stand in the way of forwarding their records to us. In any case, we have little doubt that we shall be able profitably to use them, and we will guarantee due observance of our correspondents' wishes. All communications should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 4, Ave Maria-lane, London, E.C.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

At Nice, Spiritism is one of the standing topics of conversation in society, where it is stated that the late Prince Leopold, on the morning previous to his death, at Cannes, said that he had seen his deceased sister smilingly beckoning to him. At a séance here the medium asked a sceptic to earnestly call some one to mind whom he had, when living, loved. He said he had done so. Presently her hand wrote in characters she did not understand, but the sceptic did; it was, he said, Russian, and it was a Russian of whom he thought. At his further request what he wore under his vest was accurately described—a talisman.—Revue Spirite.

BARON DAVISO obtained some spirit photographs in the studio of S. Tonker at Rome, the particulars of which appeared in the Revue Spirite of December, 1879. On a recent occasion, two of the leading photographers of Rome said that such photographs must be fabrications. The Baron, therefore, publicly offers any photographer 500 francs to produce a photograph of a deceased person under similar conditions, the work to be judged by a committee to be mutually appointed. He points out the characteristics of the photograph of a spirit form, which are inimitable by ordinary photographic art. The photographers of Rome and also of Milan have, on consideration, declined the attempt.—Revue Spirite.

A SPIRITUALISTIC LEGACY.—The late M. Jadot left 8,500frs. to be devoted to the promulgation of Spiritualism. The Messenger has received three thousand francs for its share, and the Groupe La Paix, one thousand francs. These sums have been put together, and will be used in the purchase and distribution of books, &c., under the supervision of a committee appointed by our established Groupes. M. Leruth, of Poulseur, has received one thousand five hundred francs; he writes that he has already used a portion in agreement with his Groupe. M. Howart, of Lemaing, president of the Société Spiritualiste, has received one thousand francs; the committee of the society is employing it in the purchase and distribution of books, &c., in Lemaing and the neighbouring communes. Accounts will be kept and presented to the various Groupes, of all expenses made in accordance with the wishes of our departed warm-hearted friend.—Le Messenger.

"APPARITIONS" FORMED IN FULL VIEW.

III.

By JOHN S. FARMER.

Since the publication of the report of our Committee in "LIGHT" for February 28th, I have received a communication in respect to the phenomena then recorded from Mr. S. W. Watson, of Birkby, Huddersfield. This letter is a representative one; therefore I quote the relevant passages in extenso, and I will then deal with the several points raised.

I should like, with your permission, to make a few remarks on the séance reported at such length in "LIGHT," February 28th—a séance which one of the witnesses claims to be one of the most remarkable that ever occurred. Presuming, sir, that this séance, and the published account of it, were meant not merely for Spiritualists only—in which case my letter would be irrelevant—but, from the prominence given to accuracy of detail, and the evident sincerity of the witnesses, that it was intended also for general readers, I think my remarks may not be entirely out of place; particularly as I notice that, from the letters that appear from time to time in "LIGHT," you thoroughly recognise the principle of audi alteram partem.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that the séance, when viewed either by the unwashed and unregenerate hoi polloi, or by those who, like myself, occupy that border line where we "hop between two twigs," or, as we translate it, halt between two opinions, will appear most unsatisfactory and inconclusive; and however interesting it may be to those who have been fortunate enough to reach those higher planes of spiritual conviction, will, when viewed in the light of a test experiment, be considered by sceptics and doubters as a failure.

The first weak point that occurs to me is—that the séance should have taken place at the house of the medium. This, to say the least, was unfortunate; for it opens, at the very outset, a door for cavil and objection; for, I think, it is generally admitted that, on his own ground, a clever conjurer is more than a match for the sharpest and severest scrutiny.

The next point is with regard to the light. I think one might ask—1st, Was the light sufficiently good to enable the nearest sitters, notably No. 1 and No. 14, to distinguish the curtain in front of the bath-room door, and, as a matter of course, the space between the curtain and the spot marked B in the plan? 2ndly, Assuming there was a sufficiency of light, was strict watch kept upon that part of the room previous to the appearance of the figure, and most particularly during that remarkable downpour of muslin or whatever it might be? It is a well-known plan of conjurers to distract the attention of their audience, and then concentrate it upon some particular point by means of some dramatic by-play; and this can they do in the fullest light, and with the largest audience. How much easier, then, will it be in a darkened room, and with a small audience, consisting, too—I think I am right in assuming—if not entirely, principally of devout Spiritualists. I can conceive it perfectly easy to a skilful hand to introduce his spirit, or rather for the spirit to introduce himself, while all eyes and attentions were directed to that mystical manufacture of muslin; which latter, when piled in a large heap, as it appears to have been, would afford a convenient shield while the figure was approaching. Mind, I do not say that it was so; I only state the doubts and suspicions that arise in me.

But, to my mind, the weakest part, by far, in the whole séance is this, that when the figure and the psychic disappeared through the curtain, there appears to be no record of any prompt and accurate scrutiny of the bath-room. Of course I can imagine a thorough Spiritualist would think this superfluous, but I am speaking as a heathen. One witness alone says something on the subject, viz., "that after some minutes Mr. Eglinton was found, &c." "but that the visitor had disappeared or had become invisible."

Now, "after some minutes" is very vague, and on the supposition that the séance was a test one, there ought not to have been a quarter of a minute allowed to elapse before examining that closet. What ought to have been done is this: someone should have been placed at the door leading into the bath-room, then the moment the medium and the form had retired through the curtain, another person should have stationed himself there; after that, it does not matter how many minutes you allow, it only remains to search the bath-room carefully, very carefully, remembering it is his own house. Assuming all this to have been done by shrewd, and at the same time by known trustworthy persons, and better still if they were outsiders not connected with the circle—then, if no trace of the mysterious visitant were discovered, I cannot conceive of but one opinion on the matter.

I do not think, Sir, the theory of materialisation will receive any additional confirmation, at least not in the eyes of unbelievers or honest doubters, from this séance.

Although in some cases the fact of the séance having taken place at the residence of the medium might properly be considered as detrimental to the value of the evidence, yet in this instance the argument cannot fairly be held as applicable. The strength of the testimony for the phenomenon recorded in "LIGHT" for February 28th, lies in the fact of its being entirely independent of such precautions. Diligent and careful search was made, both previous and subsequent to the séance, of the adjoining room, and all means of access for a possible confederate were carefully barred. Even, however, if these precautions had not been observed, the value of the evidence would not have been, in the least degree, vitiated. If Mr. Watson will carefully read the testimony again, he will observe that (1) Mr. Eglinton came alone from the inner room; (2) that his every movement was plainly discernible; and (3) that the light was sufficient for careful observation. How, then, even assuming, for the sake of argument, that a confederate gained access to the inner room, could he (the confederate) have passed into the room in which the "apparition" was formed, unknown to one or two at least of the fourteen witnesses? Such an idea is the more manifestly absurd if it is remembered that all testify that the light was good; quite sufficient indeed to enable everyone to see what was taking place, and enough to enable most of those present to observe in detail the various stages of the phenomenon. Moreover, from the position occupied by Mr. Eglinton during the process, the gaze of all the observers was directed to that portion of the room in which, to take part in what occurred, a confederate must have made his or her appearance. I am personally perfectly satisfied that no man, woman, or child, could possibly have passed through the door leading from the inner room to the séance room without my instantly having become aware of it; this also is the testimony of all my fellow witnesses. In addition to this, it must be remembered I carefully secured the only means of ingress, searched the room both before and after the séance, and found everything to my satisfaction. I have also satisfied myself that the door in question is not "a trick door," as someone has suggested; nor is there a trap door at, or near, the spot at which the apparition was developed, nor indeed in any part of the two rooms. This has been ascertained by the most careful scrutiny. But—that inevitable "but"—I did not look up the chimney (the circle was between it and the "form"), and possibly someone got himself tied to the end of the apparatus of some chimney sweeper, and in that way gained access to the room, and then—why, all would be very easy!

In answer to Mr. Watson's question about the light, I must refer him to the account already given. It was, as a matter of fact—the description given is under rather than over-stated—sufficiently good to enable every person present to observe the curtains in question, and I have already said strict watch was kept. No amount of by-play would have so distracted my attention (nor, I am assured, did it distract the attention of other witnesses to whom I have mentioned this point) as to have rendered possible what Mr. Watson suggests.

Mr. Watson's third question has already been answered in dealing with the other points he raises.

The whole matter really resolves itself into these alternatives: Either fourteen persons have united to perjure themselves, or they were, one and all, simultaneously deceived. Whether either of these hypotheses is credible, or whether it is more likely that the fourteen witnesses possessed just sufficient every-day common-sense to observe accurately, and to record faithfully, what they saw, I leave to others to judge. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that to some minds, "projecting teeth," "broomsticks," "fishing rods," and "chimney sweep's tackle" are formidable obstacles to the acceptance of plain unvarnished statements of fact! As to the investigators being Spiritualists—I pass by the question as to whether they are "devout" or not—such is the case. But that fact is no disqualification, provided they are, in addition, careful and patient seekers for truth; and ceteris paribus, their experience in research of this kind would undoubtedly stand them in good stead, compared with the facilities for observation and judgment at the command of those who are confessedly novices in these studies. Still it is well to subject all results to the severest scrutiny, and if my remarks serve to satisfy the undoubtedly honest though extremely crude criticism of Mr. Watson, I shall be very pleased.

Mr. Podmore and "Spiritualism at Home."

SIR,—With supreme indifference to all Mr. Podmore's criticisms to-day, of phenomena which occurred in my house twelve months ago, these wonders still go on! Tests accumulate; fires are lighted at all hours of the day; messages are written which ordinary hands and eyes cannot imitate or read comfortably without help: other phenomena also which I have not published are developing; and if he, and Mr. Hughes, after an hour's examination, can take upon themselves to pronounce oracularly that these things are capable of a simple and natural explanation, there are many other persons cognisant of them, who have stayed in my house, who calmly and earnestly protest against the monstrous and ludicrous insufficiency of these explanations.

Mr. Podmore will not in so many words accuse me of dishonesty. I should think better of his frankness if he would, instead of doing so through his shadowy authority—his "Mrs. Harris, which her name he does not give"! My crime is that I have referred to a person as a Greek scholar, "whose knowledge" (according to his own profession) "is scarcely beyond the alphabet." Mr. Podmore will excuse me if I decline to accept the modest self-depreciation of a person, with high ideals of culture, as a fair description of actual attainments. Was Hamlet a rogue and peasant-slave,—a dull and muddy-mettled rascal, a pigeon-livered coward! Was St. Paul the chief of sinners! And, if Mr. Podmore's philosophy and imagination are unequal to the task of interpreting such a simple case of self-detraction, is he, therefore, entitled to bring "Mrs. Harris" to testify that I am "absolutely dishonest," when it is possibly only in evidence that he himself and "Mrs. Harris" are both dull! Clearly, Mr. Podmore is not familiar with that type of noble humility which shrinks from praise, and is ready to cheapen its own accomplishments when appreciation becomes too warm. But even apart from this dimness of perception, it seems to me that Mr. Podmore is certainly not generous, and, I am disposed to say, scarcely just, either to me or to our mutual friend, when he strains a collateral point of this kind with the simple view of fastening a charge of some kind of duplicity upon me. For, however Mr. Podmore may sheath his claws under a velvet covering of conventional politeness, this is what he very plainly indicates.

So far as the merits of the Greek are concerned, I do not rely on the judgment of this one friend only. For my purpose it matters very little whether the Greek is accurate or not. The "phenomenal" character remains the same, whether the language is Attic Greek or Fourth Form Greek. I think that the opinion of competent critics amounts to this—the Greek is not bad, but it might be better!

I have no objection to Mr. Podmore's corroborating double, Mr. Hughes; he strengthens my allegation that a more official and formal character is claimed for his report, than that which I supposed his original investigation possessed. I do not wish to make more of this point than it deserves; but if Mr. Podmore does not appear throughout the whole business as an authorised and presumably deputed representative of the Society for Psychical Research, I have a difficulty in understanding the varied emphasis which he puts upon his official standing, and his association with Mr. Hughes. Yet I know that this claim is unauthorised, for the secretary of the Society writes, in answer to an inquiry, "The subject of the phenomena at your house was never before the council (otherwise than in incidental allusions) and no deputation was ever made by the council to investigate them." For the sake of the Society, of which I am a member, I am glad to learn it was in no sense an official business, though the Society is naturally willing that its faithful sons should take every opportunity of doing its work, and would readily give its work an ex post facto recognition if such reports should prove deserving of a place in its annals!

I do not think Mr. Podmore's additional criticisms are of any importance. He attributes the whole of the phenomena to trickery and evidently believes that I am befooled by my servant (probably also by my own children fifteen years of age?). I can only call attention to the large mass of work involved, as totally inconsistent with this very crude, I am almost disposed to think vulgar, explanation. In reference to this point, a friend who has been pursuing these inquiries for many years, makes this sensible remark: "It is often easy to find an explanation by some cumbrous, difficult, and laborious process of deception, which would account for one strange fact; and, if that fact stood alone, such explanation would be accepted as the less improbable. But when the facts are multiplied, as yours are, the explanation fails, and the spiritual explanation becomes more easy, because it is not in human nature to devote enormous and wearying labour and great skill, to carry on a deception for months and years with no object whatever to gain."

Mr. Podmore's aim seems to be, throughout, to reduce the phenomena within the limits of ordinary events, and I submit that he signally fails to do so.

He is nervous over measurements, timid about 9ft. 4in., creeps under an archway, and if I persist in going to the top, screams out, like a suspicious schoolboy, "That isn't fair!" (9ft. 4in. is correct.) He is exultant over his feat of condensing 201 words into a space of 2in. by 1½in.; he mounts his broomstick and rides across the ceiling, and is extremely anxious that all the writings found there should be large and straggling, and evidently very disappointed because they are not. I have only referred to one that is not, whereas I might have completed his discomfort by saying there is not one which would bear that bald description; so at least all of the many friends who came in response to the invitation given in "LIGHT" to judge for themselves, have decided. (The writings on the ceilings vary in length from 3in. to 14in., and the size of letters ranges from very small hand to round and text hand, as known in copy-books.) Perhaps they have shrunk since Messrs. Podmore and Hughes saw them a year ago!

His explanations strike me and others as laboured, struggling, forced, artificial, and unwieldy. If they feebly suggest how the things might be done, they are utterly insufficient to explain how they were, and are, done; and, if correct, my unobtrusive handmaiden is a prodigy of fraudulent cleverness; while poor I am either a perjured accomplice or credulous victim, capable of finding authentic fact in a nursery rhyme, helpless in her hands, more baffled than the most bewildered detective who ever worked himself into a frenzy over a mare's nest.

Mr. Podmore and Mr. Hughes, a year ago, had a magnificent opportunity of investigating some of the most remarkable spiritualistic phenomena of the day, and, had they been a little more experienced, they would not have settled such perplexing problems after one cursory inspection of an hour's duration, but, with a laudable desire to prove all things, to prevent mistakes and avoid hasty conclusions, would have frankly told me of their difficulties, and I would have met them, and given them every facility for following up honest inquiries to a satisfactory issue, worth recording, and instructive to themselves and all concerned. They would themselves have obtained the subsequent confirmation which angers them now as further evidence. As it is, they have effectually shut the door upon themselves by their hasty and unscientific behaviour, and made it more difficult for the Society they claim to represent to undertake better investigations in future.

Just one word to your readers. I wrote these accounts for them and not with a view to scientific scrutiny, though I do not shrink from that at any time. If I do not at present reply to Mr. Podmore on the difficult question of identity, I may remind them that I have already partly done so in a letter which Mr. Podmore, doubtless for good reasons, overlooks (see "LIGHT," September 13th, 1884); which contains a key which may possibly help Spiritualists to solve many questions on this very interesting, but complicated subject.—Yours faithfully,

MORELL THEOBALD.

March 14th, 1885.

P.S.—Mr. Podmore no doubt thinks his case strengthened by adding Mr. Hughes's letter after his own. Let us see. Mr. Hughes writes: "Before paying our visit to Mr. Theobald last May . . . we went carefully through Mr. Theobald's letters to 'LIGHT' of March and April." Indeed! As their visit was made on Tuesday, the 18th March, how could they possibly read letters written in March and April? I will suggest that Mr. Hughes should keep a diary (as we do), and that he should apologise for such a ridiculously inaccurate statement. He did not read my two letters in April. Your readers, after this, will be perfectly able to judge on which side are the inaccuracies complained of. I have not another word to say to such critics: the reductio ad absurdum can no further go!

[This correspondence must now close. It is obvious that no good purpose can be served in continuing it. Speaking apart from personal investigation, we are inclined to the belief, already expressed, that Mr. Podmore's difficulties arise, wholly and solely, from the incomplete, and, on the face of it, hasty investigation which he accorded the phenomena occurring in Mr. Theobald's household. While giving Messrs. Podmore and Hughes credit for the keenest powers of observation, and the wisest and most acute capacity for sitting in judgment on these matters, we must also remind them that history is full of records of the unwisdom of verdicts expressed under similar conditions. As to the question of identity, that rests on an entirely different basis, and in the present incomplete state of our knowledge on this point Mr. Theobald is wise in deferring a reply.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Pease is by no means accurate in his letter which appears in your last issue. In January of 1884 (not having my diary for that year with me I am uncertain as to dates), he arranged for a series of six sittings, three of which were, I think, held at his residence, and three at the chambers of another gentleman. At the second sitting most marked phenomena took place; but probably owing to the change of circle, and the removal elsewhere, we obtained absolutely nothing at the remaining four sittings. Being anxious to secure results—for although it was understood the members of the circle were not an official committee of the Psychical Society, yet they were, as Mr. Pease confesses, assisted by the leading members of that body—I offered to give six more sittings without a fee. This offer was accepted, and these sittings took place on the premises of the Society in Dean's-yard, and we certainly obtained minor phenomena, such as the movements of objects, lights, &c. Mr. Pease's statement that they "obtained practically no phenomena of any sort" is, therefore, not in accordance with the actual facts; although these facts may have been explained away by the "projecting teeth" theory of one of their number, and so not counted as a "result!"—I am, Sir, yours truly,

Hotel Bauer, Venice.

W. EGLINTON.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am glad to think that my letter of inquiry has at last elicited two very definite answers, one from Mr. Eglinton, the other from Mr. Pease. From these it appears that Mr. Eglinton is perfectly willing to be investigated by the Society for Psychical Research, and is able to yield their unofficial representatives "practically no phenomena of any sort." Nothing, in its peculiar way, can be more straightforward, conclusive, and generally satisfactory. Doubtless, it was to this that "C. C. M." referred when, in his reply to me, he mourned over "the people who ask for testimony and more testimony and still let it all flow through their minds like water through a sieve." Let him be comforted! my craving for testimony is at last appeased, and the "sieve" is satisfied with its sifting.—Faithfully yours,

A. EUBULE-EVANS.

[In justice to Mr. Eglinton it must be stated that although comparatively unsuccessful with Mr. Pease and his friends, yet other members of the Psychical Society obtained thoroughly satisfactory results—for example, Mr. C. C. Massey, Hon. Percy Wyndham, the Hon. Roden Noel, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, and other prominent members.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In reply to my remarks in your number of the 7th inst., Mr. E. R. Pease informs us that the Society have already tested Mr. Eglinton, if not quite formally, yet substantially, through the writer himself and some other members, and with a most abortive result. "We obtained practically no phenomena of any sort." These, therefore, were what we may call negative sittings. Now, since then, especially in the present year, many sittings have been held with him, and if the sitters are to be believed, they have obtained the most positive and astounding results. Among those present there were Mr. C. C. Massey, Mr. Roden Noel, and others for aught I know quite as honest, intelligent, and reliable as Mr. Pease himself and his associates.

Now the question is, are the abortive sittings utterly to outweigh the positive and successful ones? It would be reversing every rule of equity to say so, unless we have good reason for affirming that the sitters in the first instance were undeniably superior, both in honesty and intelligence, to those in the second instance, and that the latter were notoriously wanting in both respects. Are negative results to be accepted as nullifying all the testimony given for positive ones? This may be a good rule in Bedlam, but assuredly nowhere outside of it.

Now I want to know whether the Psychical Society dismisses the case of Mr. Eglinton as that of a proved impostor, and if not why do they delay to test him? This is more strange, as Messrs. Gurney and Myers have said in the May number of the Nineteenth Century, speaking of Telepathy: "The testing or verification of such speculations as these must be left for a later stage of this inquiry. The achievement which we claim for our Society is not a theory of causes, but a colligation of facts." In flat contradiction of this, the Society turns away from the testing of credibly asserted facts, while it spins telepathic theories and utters assumptions which seem likely to develop into the grossest materialism.

I may add that if Mr. Eglinton is not a true man, the Society can do no better service than to expose him. Why should they hesitate? Again, if he is a true man and no deceiver, they are bound to throw their shield over him. To refuse to do this would be cowardly and base.

He says in a short note, which appeared in your issue of February 21st, "I believe it is no secret, I have sat with many of the most prominent members of that Society, with what results only those who have had the experience can say." This seems to point to a different result than that announced by Mr. Pease. Be this as it may, we want Mr. Eglinton's pretensions tested anew, and that officially, by the Society itself, not in the timid, semi-official way they resorted to before, which looks evasive.

I wish also to say that "the Matter through Matter" case cannot be left where it is. Dr. Wyld has beaten Mr. Gurney at every point, and has shown how shallow and evasive are all the objections raised. They were the remarks of one who would not use the best available means of ascertaining the truth. Some would say that he did not want to find it.

I therefore submit that the Eglinton and Husk cases ought to be subjected to a fresh scrutiny on the part of the Society, otherwise they will incur the charge of wasting time, wasting opportunities, and wasting means entrusted to their disposal.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

We are requested to announce that Mr. W. Eglinton has secured the copyright of the translation of Baron Hellenbach's "Birth and Death," and all his future works.

In Saxony, says Dr. Cyriax, in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, "there are spiritualist societies with 800 enrolled members and thrice as many unenrolled, and they are on the increase. There is also a Theosophical Society. Of course I encounter virulent antagonism."

"THERE ARE HIDDEN FORCES IN NATURE—"

—The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

It has been said that the two great giants of the present century are steam and electricity. Both these powers existed in a latent form thousands of years ago, but the minds of the men at that remote date were not subtle and delicate enough to discover, from the small indications given, that two such powers were really in existence. Kettles and saucepans contained water which was made to boil, and the lids of these vessels probably jumped up when the steam was generated in sufficient quantities, but these significant manifestations were overlooked, and so, for thousands of years, steam remained an unknown power.

Hundreds of years ago the rubbing of amber produced an effect which surprised the inexperienced, and a loadstone was known to possess a power which was considered wonderful. Nature exhibited her latent force in the lightning's flash, and yet the coarse minds of former ages could find nothing in these indications worthy of their attention. To investigate any new subject, especially when this subject is ruled by subtle and delicate laws, requires a mental organisation of a very high order. When any person has gone before, and established certain laws and facts, it is easy enough for a mere average mind to follow and to be taught. The rarity of minds capable of dealing with delicate laws in nature is shown by the fact that it is only in modern times that steam and electricity have been brought into general use. Had either of these subjects been mere rough and coarse matters, they would have been discovered, and worked, centuries ago. Any problems in nature, which are not generally known, must naturally be those governed by even more delicate and subtle laws than those which regulate steam, or electricity, and therefore there will be fewer minds capable of comprehending, or even perceiving, these laws. We might show to a mere savage a small electric battery, and ask him what use might be made of it, and he would certainly fail to perceive that any use would result; his mind could not grasp the probable effects. This would be due to the fact that the subject was beyond him. Any force in nature not hitherto discovered must be a force which is of too delicate a nature to have been hitherto discerned by the minds of men of the past.

When we come to the physical phenomena appertaining to Spiritualism, we have to deal with exactly such a power. We find that phenomena occur hitherto unknown, or only recorded as miraculous. These phenomena have been rare, and seeming to occur only under exceptional conditions. Had they not been rare, they would have been recognised and placed on the record of exact science, hundreds of years ago. But the laws which govern these manifestations are most subtle and delicate, and to investigate these we require, not the mere brute force type of mind, but the delicate, yet intense brain power, possessed by so few men. Manifestations take place under certain conditions, and with certain persons, but not always; and why not? Because the whole of the conditions which existed on one occasion, did not exist on other occasions. And what were these conditions? It may be that the physical state of the medium was not the same, that the atmosphere was damp, that the electric state of the atmosphere was different, that the physical condition of those present was different, that those who were present had lately been in the society of persons whose atmosphere was of what may be termed an antagonistic type; and a hundred other conditions might prevail, of which conditions we have as yet but a very imperfect knowledge.

That a certain remarkable and unusual effect occurs, say half-a-dozen times in succession, and then fails to occur, is considered by the coarse mind to indicate that there is nothing to examine, but, to the mind of power and high intelligence, it proves that there is an effect produced under certain conditions, which conditions cannot always be secured, even granting that we know what all these conditions should be. Let us have but one thoroughly well-authenticated case of a table rising in the air without contact of any kind, thus proving an invisible power which overcomes gravity; or let us have but one clearly established case of writing occurring between closed slates, and without the aid of a human hand, and to the mind capable of venturing on these, and grasping the value of the facts, there is evidence of a discovery which may exceed in importance all that we know of steam or electricity.

At a late gathering of so-called scientific men, it was announced that one of the most important and valuable communications ever received by the Association had just been announced, viz., that some little creature hitherto supposed to produce its young in the egg form, was found not to do so. Truly this is an admirable example of the expansiveness of the minds which claim infallibility. That a power is now being manifested and developed in England, France, Germany, and America, as well as in many other countries, which power exceeds in its earliest indications a thousand times the indications given by a kettle containing boiling water, or a piece of amber when rubbed, is considered by the present popular teachers in science a matter not only of no importance, but one to be ridiculed and denied. Facts, to these men, are of no significance. Their opinions are the only valuable subjects to be listened to. Why does this singular state of affairs exist? may be asked. The answer is simple. The phenomena connected with so-called spiritual manifestations are ruled by laws and conditions of so delicate a nature that the minds capable of accurately examining these are rare in the extreme. To be, as some enthusiasts are, endeavouring to convince such minds of the truth and importance of the phenomena is, perhaps, interesting, but not profitable. We may have a very clever member of the canine race in our house, but if we endeavoured to prove to him by geometry that two sides of a triangle were greater than the third side, we should not probably succeed. The animal's mind could not grasp the proof or demonstration, simply because its mind was not subtle enough to comprehend the evidence. Why then waste time on such endeavours? There is a far more important field for the labours and energies of those whose minds are of the nature suitable for comprehending delicate proofs, and appreciating the value of evidence.

Men whose minds are of the rough kind, though they may have succeeded in gaining a reputation as scientific men, cannot be correct, except by chance, when they decide on questions requiring subtle reasoning. Consequently there must be, and are, many problems, yet unsolved, or at least not generally accepted as solved, connected with all the higher sciences, which could be more readily unravelled by such minds as those which have been accustomed to deal with spiritual phenomena, than by the brute-force class of minds which have hitherto dealt with such subjects. Here is a wide opening, and one likely to be more fruitful of results than endeavouring to convince unwilling and incapable minds that certain facts exist, and which facts the commonest powers of observation would be capable of perceiving if there were not the insuperable obstacles of arrogance, prejudice, and preconceived opinion, or vested interests, standing in the way.

THE ILLUSTRATION OF SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.

Our readers have now had a fair opportunity of judging of the value of the presentation made by Mr. Keulemans and his co-donor. These chromo-lithographic illustrations of "spiritual" phenomena have, we learn, surpassed expectation; indeed, we believe that the chief cause of so many of our readers failing to make the necessary application for them in due time arose from a conviction that, as so many attempts in the same direction had signally failed so also would this last effort.

We regret the natural disappointment thus caused, and in order to minimise it as much as possible, and to popularise such means of information as far as lies in our power, it has been suggested that the four plates already issued should be reproduced on a smaller scale, and be published in separate form, together with Mr. Keulemans' valuable series of papers descriptive of them. To this might be added the report of the fourteen witnesses on the formation of an apparition in full view (from "LIGHT," Feb. 28th), and the whole would form a very important and valuable addition to the evidence for materialisation. We are ready to adopt this suggestion if we are placed in a position to do so. To minimise the estimated expense we have arranged to keep these articles in type, and the cost of production would represent £20. Will any friend undertake this responsibility? Meanwhile we shall be pleased to receive orders for the book at 2s. 6d. per copy, or eight copies for £1, if re-published as suggested. Friends will, however, oblige us by not remitting money until they receive an intimation from us that payment is required.

We know that, could this be accomplished, Mr. Keulemans and his friend would regard it as a high compliment, and the best return that could be made to them in recognition of their generous initiation of a new method of presentation of spiritual phenomena; and it would, we believe, materially aid in the continuation of the good work so well begun.

TRANSITION.

Mrs. Crowther, Sherburn, Bournemouth, passed, somewhat suddenly, to the higher life on Friday last, the 13th inst. She was a devoted Spiritualist, and an appreciative student of the works of Swedenborg and Jacob Böhme. She possessed fine intellectual powers, and, though of an unassuming and even retiring disposition, those who enjoyed her intimate friendship valued it highly.

MR. JAMES RILEY, of 11, Altoun-street, Blackburn, an inquirer into Spiritualism, desires to meet with others interested, with a view to mutual benefit. We shall esteem it as a personal favour if any Spiritualist in or near Blackburn can help Mr. Riley in his investigation.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

III.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

PLATE II.

I have here attempted to represent a materialised hand, carrying its own light; the whole being enveloped in partly solidified drapery. The subject forming this illustration has been obtained at a séance with Mr. Eglinton; and although intended to represent a combination of phenomena, it is but a fragment of a larger sketch prepared the day after the séance. My object in making a series of sketches is to illustrate the gradual formation of a "substantial spirit," as seen in a reduced light; or, in other words, to construct a series of illustrations representing some of the various stages of the gradual development of a "form." It will be obvious to those who have witnessed this process, that the delineation of a similar subject almost amounts to an impossibility. The constant change of appearance in the subject itself, the perpetual and irregular movements of the objects discernible, and the absence of requisite light, render such an attempt exceedingly difficult. Still, if I can only "supplement" memory by the observation of additional facts, and be allowed to witness the same process once more, I trust my sketches may be completed, and a series of representations given that will fairly show by what modus operandi an invisible being makes another entrée into this material world, and becomes temporarily a material "man" again.

The hand represented in Plate II. is, I believe, that of Mr. Eglinton's familiar, "Joey." Not having known "Joey" in earth-life, I am unable to testify to his identity, or to recognise the identical hand. All I can state is, that "Joey's" voice was inside an ever accumulating mass of drapery developing itself over the medium's lap. The medium, resting in an easy-chair, could be seen by the yellowish light emanating from this drapery. I ought to have stated that the room on that occasion was dark, the gas having, on request, been turned out, and that soon after the medium had retired into his chair, clouds of light were noticed over the region of his chest, and large quantities of thin substance were seen to form and condense themselves into a semi-solid mass of something like drapery falling in soft pleats on his lap. After a short while, some dark object could be observed inside this heap of flimsy substance, turning and twisting it in a lateral and circular direction. Up to that time, no other light but the phosphorescent glow emanating from the medium's chest had been noticed (unless the cloudy mass of semi-solid drapery was, perhaps, to a certain extent, self-luminous). But now, a most brilliant light suddenly appeared in front of the medium, inside the whitish mass. At first the movements were too agitated to enable me to observe the nature of the light itself, but, after a few seconds, it became more tranquil, and I then noticed that it was carried by a hand. It had the appearance of a rounded crystal, and was not unlike the semi-transparent waxy discs (Figs. 1 and 2), though more perfectly clear, and of a light bluish colour. I could now distinctly see the upper portion of the medium's body, and afterwards his right hand resting upon his knee. The hand holding the light was also a "right" one, which proved that it could not have been that of the medium. However, the brilliancy gradually diminished, and then little drops were seen to proceed from the inside of the hand, and fall into the drapery. It seemed that the luminous crystal had now been changed into a large, somewhat triangular shaped, phosphorescent light, out of which smaller sparks were projected, these projections becoming accelerated until a regular "throbbing" movement was assumed, like drops of glowing liquid oozing out of a glass tube, and inflaming when in contact with the air. This continued for about two minutes, when the throbbing movements increased to a rapid "pulsation" of about 130 to 140 per minute, and which was besides audible. It still increased in quickness of movement, not unlike a flowing stream of shivering waves of light, which gradually became calmed, and then died away. By this time the quantity of material drapery had considerably increased; but the light having "gone out," and not being able to see what was taking place, I bent a little forward in expectation that another light would be forthcoming, and accidentally touched the still flowing mass with my head. As far as I could detect there was still a faint luminosity, either behind the drapery, or the latter was slightly self-luminous. Certainly something was moving between the medium and myself, causing me to anticipate the apparition of a "form." Unfortunately, the contact with my head produced such an amount of repelling force as to entirely counteract any further operations, and the whole wonderful fabric disappeared with the swiftness of thought. As far as the process of materialisation was concerned, only the hands were exhibited. Yet, I had the great satisfaction of seeing under my very eyes the gradual formation of spirit-drapery from its primitive cloudy stage into what seemed solid material.

SPIRIT DRAPERY.

It must not be expected that in an illustration of this kind (Plate II.), a faithful reproduction of this curious substance can be given. To obtain a faultless copy of the real thing, would necessitate the application of photography. Not a small piece, but a large sheet should be obtained; part of it reproduced full size, and additional illustrations should be given of the texture of this material on a greatly magnified scale. To complete a strictly scientific investigation, part of a semi-solid, viz., "unfinished," mass should be studied under the microscope, and only then would it be possible to form some idea as to its real nature. It is to be pitied that so little knowledge has been, or can be, obtained in these matters. Every investigator has observed "spirit forms" clad in white material of various degrees of thickness, while some have witnessed its actual formation by gradual condensation. "Clothed full forms" have been seen to emerge from behind the curtains of a cabinet, in which the medium had but just taken his seat; and this has happened in cases when both medium and cabinet had been previously searched. From this rapid development of the "form," and its garments, it may be inferred that the slow and gradual procedure is not invariably followed by the "spirits."

Fragments or small pieces of drapery have, in some exceptional cases, been cut out by the forms, and distributed amongst the circle for inspection, or left as a remembrance. Such pieces, of which I have examined three examples, seem, as far as the material is concerned, in every respect similar to ordinary cotton stuff obtained at the linendraper's shop. These three pieces—said to have been cut out of the drapery of as many incontestably genuine materialised forms—did not, even when microscopically magnified, appear, in the slightest, different from washed calico. Some Spiritualists have assured me, notwithstanding, that "spirit-drapery" is or at least has, in certain cases, been found to be, distinguishable from the ordinary article by its peculiar construction of the woof, i.e., the threads. This, they say, is devoid of any adhesive fibre (fibria). But this peculiarity of thread does not, on that account, prove the "spiritual" nature or origin of the manufacture. Besides, the thread of which ordinary muslin is woven is equally smooth and even, since it is spun from nettle-flax. We have also to take into account the generally admitted (though not fully demonstrated) fact, that fragments of this spirit-drapery once obtained have been found to vanish away either quickly, viz., in a few minutes, or slowly—in a few days. This, if correct, would prove beyond a doubt that the substance is intrinsically different from the ordinary product of the loom. But is it correct? Has its slow disappearance been watched throughout? In the absence of additional testimony of reliable eye-witnesses, or direct experiment, the assertion has little or no value; for the disappearance of a very small piece of cotton stuff can be explained in many other, less miraculous, ways. Even if after repeated and patient experimentation, the foregoing thesis of a "subsequent disintegration," like the presumed distinctiveness of this "spirit-drapery," were found to be based upon fact, we should still be confronted with the serious question: "Whence" was originally procured that pre-supposed spiritual counterpart out of which "spirits" build their drapery and which they (the "spirits") say is brought with them? And it is this very question of "origin" that requires to be settled before any attempt can be made to explain the mystery of its appearance and disappearance. Before venturing to undertake so heavy a task, it may be well to first consider the several prevailing theories propounded by the majority of modern Spiritualists, and which are based partly upon observation of facts and partly upon information derived from the manifesting "spirits" themselves. It will also be necessary to compare these theories with some facts which have lately been observed through the mediumship of Mr. Eglinton.

THE LATE PROFESSOR CASSAL.

SIR,—I have just heard, with the deepest concern, that Professor Cassal, of University College, one of the most sagacious and enlightened Spiritualists,—for how much sagacity and enlightenment is not Spiritualism indebted to that institution,—passed away at an early hour on Wednesday morning.

Having made his acquaintance only in recent years, and enjoyed the opportunity of intercourse with him only occasionally, I can advance no claim to do any public justice to his memory; but a poor stone on his cairn I may seek perhaps to cast. He was a man of rare force and simplicity of character. He possessed great sweetness of nature, and a lively and delicate sense of humour. His was a large and sympathetic intellect, combining (he was, I believe, an Alsatian) the mental solidity of the Teuton with the imaginative mobility of the Frenchman. I do not remember to have met a person in whom this combination,—out of which surely is to be born the new life of the future,—was so marked, so surely on its way to the fullest development. He was a valued member of the Council of the Spiritualists Alliance, and will be deeply missed by his colleagues as a co-worker and a friend; but I can imagine no person more capable, in another condition, of being serviceable to the cause of Spiritualism here. This is a poor consolation to those who have to mourn him, and to feel that they can be sustained in their work by his manly sympathy and ripeness of judgment and experience no more; but it is a consolation, nevertheless.

May God be with him; and he, sometimes, with us.—Sincerely yours, 19, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, March 14th. A. A. WATTS.

TRANSITION OF MRS. NORTWORTH.—An inquest was held on Thursday, at Blundell Sands, Liverpool, on Mrs. Frederick A. Northworth, the wife of a Liverpool merchant, and eldest daughter of Mr. Geo. Thompson, formerly Member for the Tower Hamlets. She was accidentally poisoned by taking a quarter of an ounce of laudanum. The lady had been treated for a brain affection. There was no question as to her sanity, and she had frequently, by order, taken opium for sleeplessness. She had a private medicine chest, and was described as exceptionally intelligent. The Jury returned a verdict of death by misadventure in taking an overdose of laudanum. Mrs. Northworth was well known to many Spiritualists. For many years she was an active and most indefatigable worker in the cause. Our Liverpool friends will miss her valuable assistance most. She was also a frequent contributor in past years to the Spiritualist press.

A PROTESTANT BISHOP ON SPIRITUALISM.

The Revue Spirite of February translates a verbatim report of a sermon by Bishop Elisando, in the Protestant Cathedral of Mexico, last November. The doctrines to which the Bishop refers are, no doubt, those expressed in the books of Allan Kardec, who preferred the term Spiritism to Spiritualism, and they are much read in South America. The Bishop's text is "The Kingdom of God." It will be seen that in our translation we have condensed.

He says: "In all parts of the world, and in all times, voices from Heaven have made themselves heard among mankind, and in these latter days, when institutions that were thought ever-enduring are crumbling away, such voices are again heard with power. These voices have exhorted men to raise themselves above the engrossments of earth, and have told them of a life beyond the present."

"The idea of life in eternity is the fundamental basis of the Revelation that has come to us in these days, and which solves obscure problems of life, past, present, and future, in a mode harmonious with religious faith and reason, presenting to us not only a system of philosophico-religious doctrine, but the rational relationship between us in the body and the denizens of the spirit-world."

"I have said New Revelation. When a truth revealed long since is again enforced upon mankind it may justly be spoken of as new; as was Christianity when it came into the world, although the doctrines it taught were not new."

"When He Whom the nations expected, the promised Messiah, came, men had sunk into a depraved state, and few were found to comprehend Him. The words of the Master provoked in them anger and derision. So is it also with this new truth. Old Churches look upon it as heresy. They say the Christian Church was finished in the time of the Apostles. They do not comprehend the progressive character of truth in humanity. They forget that Jesus could not speak to the purblind and deaf masses as He could to His disciples; that He could not even to them reveal some mysteries, for He said that He had many things to tell them which they could not comprehend; but that He would send to them the Spirit of Truth Who would make things plain to them."

"The Spirit thus promised is that which is working among us now, in divers ways, in all parts of the world where the Christian revelation's primitive character has become perverted and obscured. The New Revelation is not, therefore, a new evangel. The Spirit comes now only to quicken us to receive the Gospel of Jesus by a new presentation and exposition of it."

"As all ideas transform themselves into sentiments, and these into action, and all doctrines transform themselves into institutions, so a great transformation will be fruitfully realised by the New Revelation. Its origin being from the Divine Spirit, its object being God with man, its end eternal happiness, its means spiritual, it must be regarded as a continuation of the Messianic work in establishing the Kingdom of God on earth. So the social institution in which the doctrines are to take form must be what is called a Church, truly catholic, free and universal, a Church in harmony with the Gospel of Jesus, a Church of which He will be the head, His law of love our rule, His promised Spirit of Truth our guide. In this Church there will be no separate order of priesthood; the service of religion will be without price; the exercise of the gifts of the Spirit will not be turned to gain; there will be no pre-eminence of one over another, all being brethren and servants each of the other."

"In the Kingdom of God we shall not make prayers in special places; but wherever we meet for mutual edification and encouragement, and for receiving instruction and consolation from the Divine Spirit, we shall open and close our meetings by asking the blessing of our Eternal Father, Cause of all.

"To the children of God temples will be symbols, monuments of their union with the Eternal through Faith, Hope, and Charity."

"My brethren Spiritualists, profess openly your faith! the faith destined to save the world. Let us, who are numbered by millions, unite in working as one man. Let us learn to know each other; let us, in frequent meetings, prepare ourselves for the realisation of the idea presented to us in the New Revelation—the 'Kingdom of God.'"

[This is certainly as remarkable a discourse as was ever delivered in a cathedral, and the more remarkable from the fact, according to General Gonzalez—who forwarded the report to the Revue Spirite—that the regular pastor of the congregation, in dismissing it, expressed entire concurrence and sympathy with the Bishop's utterances.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]

A SEANCE WITH MR. EGLINTON.

(From the Revue Spirite.)

Professor Charles Cassal, formerly a representative of the people from 1848 to 1851, has had a psychographic séance with Mr. Eglinton, and his narrative of the séance we think worthy to be placed before our readers. It is as follows:—

I had long been desirous to witness the fact of direct writing; at last I found myself able, and went to Mr. Eglinton, accompanied by a scientific friend, purchasing on our way several ordinary framed slates.

We found Mr. Eglinton a sympathetic, intelligent, gentlemanly young man, and he received us in a neatly-furnished room, the most striking article in which was a deal table, standing near the window.

At this table we took our seats with the medium, my friend facing him and I being on his right.

After trying my new slates, with feeble results, the medium took one of his own, cleaned it carefully, laid a fragment of pencil on it, and held it with his left hand—his right being in mine—against the under surface of the table, the slate being partly visible to me.

In answer to the question whether a spirit could communicate, we heard the sound of pencil-writing, then three little taps. We then found written, on the upper surface of the slate, the word "Yes." It seemed written from the side opposite to the medium, and it was on the part of the slate remote from his hand.

Thinking the ice broken, we returned to my own slates. Here are the results:—

1. Two were placed together with a morsel of pencil between, loose in the space formed by the apposition of their frames. The medium and I held them between us, he with his right hand, I with my left. I asked if a spirit friend was with us. We heard movements of the pencil; I distinguished the sounds of marking stops and dots, then three taps. On separating the slates I read upon the upper surface of the under one "Madame C.'s guide, Dr. F., is present and salutes you." Neither the medium nor I had left hold of the slates, and I looked fixedly upon them. Dr. F. was the name of one of our old friends.

2. My friend, holding a slate out of sight of the medium and myself, wrote upon it. I then held it against the under surface of the table. After sounds of writing and three taps, I withdrew it, and read "Yes, she is here. We regret, however, that she is not able to write. Do you not feel her presence?"

3. In my turn I wrote upon a slate, using the same precaution, "Is my friend W. present?" "Is my father here?" The answers were: "Your friend W. is not here," in French; and in English, "Your father is here, and many others with him."

4. Upon a fourth slate I wrote, "Could my father give me his signature, or a few words of his writing?" The reply was, "We are sorry that your father cannot write. He will probably be able another time." Neither the medium nor my friend could have seen what I had written. My questions were in French; the replies, as all were, except the one about my friend W., in English.

5. The medium handed to my friend a pair of hinged folding-slates, furnished with lock and key. My friend wrote, on one of the clean slates, a question, locked the slates together, put the key in his pocket, and laid them on the table. The medium and I laid a hand each upon the slates; writing was heard, then three taps. On my friend unlocking the slates he found an answer apposite to the question he had written, of a private personal nature.

6. Lastly, the medium placed two large slates together upon the table. Then we heard sounds of writing for about a minute. On separating them we found the lower one covered with writing entirely different in character to Mr. Eglinton's. A few concluding lines were above the body of the writing and written inversely to it. It was this: "We have long desired to have this opportunity. The writing which you have under your eye is produced under conditions which, under ordinary circumstances, would be impossible. It consequently goes to prove the truth of what we are endeavouring to promulgate. What is the agent or acting cause in the phenomena? That does not much matter. The fact is here. Certain clever, lynx-eyed persons, who pretend to explain what they have never seen, will one day have to admit their ignorance. But to those who, like you, enjoy the consolation and advantage of knowing this truth, I say that the knowledge they acquire and are able to impart, should compensate for what they endure in an unpopular cause. Farewell.—ERNEST."

In conclusion, it is needless to say that my friend and I took every precaution which men with their eyes open, seeking for truth, could take, and we affirm that deception was simply impossible. All took place in full daylight, and, when that began to fade, in the light of a large lamp.

I only record irrefragable facts. I leave others to draw conclusions.

CHARLES CASSAL.

"J. C. D." writes in eulogistic terms of the result of his investigations with Mr. J. Thomas, of Frodsham, and Miss Pawley, 33, Bayston-road, Stoke Newington.

In The Messiah's Advocate, Oakland, California, H. D. Irwin writes: "Spiritualism finds converts not only among infidels but among church members. This ought not to surprise, for Spiritualism demonstrates absolutely the fact, which church members hold in the abstract or only more or less vaguely, of conscious spiritual existence after death. It is, therefore, logically a complement to their own faith."

In Australia Gerald Massey has aided much in disseminating liberal ideas generally. He has been well received everywhere. He has just undertaken a series of spiritualist lectures in Queensland. In New South Wales the area of spiritualism is extending. At Sydney the Theatre Royal has crowded audiences every Sunday evening, to listen to spiritualist lecturers. Numerous circles are formed in the city, and mediums of every kind are being developed. In New Zealand progress is marked; the editor of an important journal, Mr. Bright, has, with his wife, been instrumental in this extension.—Le Messenger.

La Nueva Luz (The New Light), published by the Spiritist Society of Caracas, the capital of the South American Republic of Venezuela, informs us that a society has been formed at Sombrero, "for the exercise of mediumship, and the study of the works of Allan Kardec"; and that another has been formed at La Victoria, "for promulgating the doctrine, and for the scientific study of psychological phenomena." But the Spiritists meet with active clerical opposition; for instance at Barbacas—a town remote from the great centres—the curé threatened them with excommunication; but finding this of no effect, expelled them with the aid of the fanatical peasants, persuading them that he was supported by the Government.—Le Messenger.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XX.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Christian Million—"be the same more or less"—has published a long article entitled "Two Nights with the Spiritualists," a title I consider unfair, since there are varieties in Spiritualists as in other classes—so that the substitution of some for the, would be more fair. What the writer saw was one of Mr. Duguid's pictures and some photographs; what he heard was supposed to be trance-speaking, the medium's controls being the spirit of a very unorthodox Quaker and a North American Indian. Not very satisfactory.

But at the second séance the correspondent met with some undoubted and very wonderful clairvoyance, which it was impossible to attribute to fraud, but which he hesitates to attribute to spirits. What troubles him is that "these millions of Spiritualists are not orthodox Christians." Consequently the more wonderful their facts the worse for them and the world, and he comes to the extraordinary conclusion that the whole thing is a fraud, a mistake—and also Satanic and extremely dangerous!

Well, some say, nine-tenths fraud and only one-tenth diabolism. But our friends of the Christian Million—if there be really so many—must settle the proportions to suit themselves. We who give the phenomena a serious, and, in many cases, a scientific examination, know how little there is or can be of fraud. As to the diabolism, it matters very little.

And how much of fraud and diabolism might one imagine to be mixed up with our hundred and seven religious sects? What opinion have Papists of Protestants, and vice versa? What do Trinitarians think of Unitarians, and the reverse—again? Come gentlemen of the Christian Million! Do you not see that the charges of fraud and diabolism may have a wide application? Has it never been intimated, for example, that our churches and conventicles were filled with hypocrites and idiots—or, in plainer terms, with knaves and fools?

The true thing to do in all matters of doubt is to follow the plain words of inspiration and common-sense: "Prove all things—hold fast to that which is good"; the good being the true. To reject a fact because it teaches us something we did not know, or did not wish to know, would be the greatest conceivable folly.

"It is a great mistake of Christianity," says the writer in the Christian Million, "to ignore this modern superstition"—Spiritualism. "It is slaying its thousands and tens of thousands by its 'seducing spirits and doctrine of devils.'" Well! Christianity makes "mistakes," and even "great mistakes," it seems, or else this writer does. But how a true religion, with its inspired Gospels, can make mistakes, the Christian Million has forgotten to inform us.

Spiritualism has had its martyrs. Some have been banished, some imprisoned. Mrs. Weldon just escaped a lunatic asylum, to become the terror and attraction of the Law Courts. But our greatest martyr, perhaps, was poor Thackeray, who dared to publish an account of a séance with Home in the Cornhill Magazine. Imagine the agonies of an editor, one of the most popular of our time, who, by the sole indiscretion of printing a few pages of spirit phenomena, knocked off some thousands of his circulation.

The Daily Telegraph, in one of its learned leading articles, explains faith-healing, which has broken out in the Salvation Army, and recalls the marvellous cures performed two centuries ago by Valentine Greatrakes, who, it says, "is reported to have deceived a huge number of people in every rank and class of life. His simple method of curing diseases by means of stroking—a form of the imposition of hands." Greatrakes may have been a mesmerist, he may have been a healing medium, but healing by the laying on of hands was for centuries exercised by the Kings and Queens of England, and the facts of an immense number of cures performed by them have the testimony of the best men and the wisest physicians down to the reign of Queen Anne.

A curious fact is that one of the most popular and successful of these Royal healing mediums was that least moral of modern monarchs, the Second Charles. Henry VIII. also cured great numbers—and his marital eccentricities did not diminish the popular faith in his powers of healing. The Salvation Army has merely taken a leaf out of the Church of England Book of Common Prayer, which a few years ago contained the form of service used by the Bishop who attended the healing monarch when he cured the "King's Evil"—curiously so named, because the king or queen had this power of healing it. So eminent a man and moralist as Dr. Johnson was touched by Queen Anne, after the prayers were solemnly read which were afterwards torn from the book.

Speaking of prayers, there seems to be a growing, rather than a diminishing faith in their efficacy—which is a form of Spiritualism. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Rochester, perhaps other Bishops, have published forms of prayers for our Army in Egypt and the Soudan—prayers that God may be pleased to help our soldiers kill more of the Mahdi's soldiers than they can kill of ours. Of course, the holy Mahdi, who holds himself quite equal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, is fervently praying on the other side. When men get in earnest in their efforts to kill each other they fall to praying.

And, really, if God, in answer to the prayers of either the Archbishop or the Mahdi, helps men to kill each other, why should He not, in answer to General Booth or Major Pierson, help them to cure?

And the high authorities of the Church, we are told, are adopting the tactics of the Salvation Army. Have we not just had a special mission in the West End Churches, which have been crammed with worshippers? Certainly there is a growing faith in some sorts of spiritualism. Who can say how far it has been influenced by our manifestations? Who can tell how much effect the knowledge of a few may have upon the faith of many?

It is quite true that we are told in the Holy Scriptures that persons having or consulting spirits incurred the punishment of death, and that King Saul was heavily punished for talking with a materialised spirit, when he had a séance with that eminent medium, the "Witch" of Endor. But it is not pretended that any fraud was practised, or that Samuel did not appear. In fact, if the Bible, Old Testament or New, is a record of facts, Spiritualism was well known from Adam to St. Paul.

The ghosts in Shakespeare's plays and the horrid persecutions for witchcraft in Europe and America, up to a recent period, show how prevalent and all but universal was the belief in Spiritualism over the civilised world. As to ghosts, enough of the faith remains to enable our politest audiences to enjoy "Richard III.," "Macbeth," or "Hamlet." Twenty years ago I saw a drama in the theatre in Tottenham Court-road, in which there were eleven ghosts, who came to denounce and punish that reverend wretch whom Charles II. had whipped and pilloried.

I have it on good authority that a certain Prince in Austria is a splendid physical medium of the highest order. His manifestations are chiefly spontaneous; that is to say, he only sits when he is impressed to do so—when the movements of objects in the light and materialisations in the dark frequently occur. He has been instrumental in doing great good by converting many prominent persons in society. When will some of those mediums who are well-known members of our aristocracy do the same thing for Spiritualism in this country?

"VERDADE E LUZ" (Truth and Light) is the title of a handsome book of 382 pages, 8vo., by M. Manuel Nicolau da Costa, whose literary and scientific works are appreciated wherever the Portuguese language is spoken. The author informs his readers that in Lisbon a society is formed, called the "Portuguese Spiritual Centre," for the promulgation of magnetism and Spiritism.—Moniteur Spirite et Magnétique.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

GLASGOW.—The appeal on behalf of the Guarantee Fund for ensuring the re-engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis for a further six months, and to which reference was made last week, has already produced very encouraging results. It is hoped those whom the appeal has reached, and who feel inclined to assist in the attainment of so desirable an object as the one in view, but have not yet responded, will speedily make up their minds so as to enable the committee to arrange this important matter of business with all possible despatch. Last Sunday's proceedings at the hall, 2, Carlton-place, were harmonious, instructive, and promotive of the cause of Spiritualism. At the morning séance the manifestations of clairvoyance through Mr. Wallis, under control of his "familiar" Lighthouse, were lucid, and in several instances convincing to those on whose behalf the descriptions of spirit friends were given. In the evening Mr. Wallis' guides discoursed on the subject of "Man's Three Saviours"; and were successful in giving expression to some eloquent and suggestive thoughts on false and true education, &c. On Friday, 20th inst., a soirée will be held here, when Mr. Morse will be in our midst for the last time prior to his intended trip abroad. Next Sunday and Monday evenings Mr. Morse will occupy the platform; his subjects: "The Gospel of Rest," and "Man: Why was he made?"—ST. MUNGO.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S. President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perry, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

ANOTHER medium for the direct writing has appeared in the person of C. S. West, of Syracuse, N.Y., tests through whom of spirit identity have given great satisfaction to the editor of Facts.

ABRAHAM JAMES, once a prominent resident in Chicago, has passed to spirit-life in Oregon, aged seventy-seven. Years ago, in Pennsylvania, he discovered through his mediumship, he said, a spot for oil. He got up a company, who sunk a well which yielded 150 gallons daily for a considerable time.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. ——— is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

FAILURES VERSUS SUCCESSES IN PSYCHOGRAPHY.

By C. C. MASSEY.

Mr. Haughton will have observed from the letter of another of your correspondents, that the rule that experimental failures nullify successes finds favour elsewhere than in Bedlam. And granting the assumption on which it rests, it is perfectly reasonable. That assumption is not, in the first instance, that one set of investigators were competent and that the other were not, but that all the conditions of a genuine result, if such a result were possible, were equally present in the one case as in the other. That being so, the incompetence of the apparently successful observers, and the fallacy of their results, are not at all assumed, but are rigorously proved, upon the principle of the uniform operation of natural laws. Given a perfect similarity of conditions, the same result must follow. To take an instance from recent science, Professor Tyndall's negative results in the experiments relating to the origin of life effectually nullified Dr. Charlton Bastian's affirmative results. And why? Because in that case the only conditions of the experiment, (1) that the germs in the vegetable infusion should be effectually destroyed; (2) that the bottles should be effectually sealed, were exactly known. When Professor Tyndall's bottles were found, or being opened, to contain no life, it was as clear a proof as could be afforded that Dr. Bastian's precautions had been defective.

Were it simply a question of the competence of investigators I should certainly remonstrate against being put forward myself as a representative of the affirmative side, because my intelligence is to the general public an unknown quantity. If the failure of certain distinguished members of the Society for Psychical Research is thought important on account of their known intellectual competence, we have merely to set off the successes, some after prolonged investigation, of such men as Zollner, Fechner, Weber, Wallace, and, perhaps, we may now add Richet and Ribot. But that is really not the question. The fallacy we have to meet is the assumption about conditions. We are here in a new and profoundly obscure field of research, and yet it is assumed that the apparent conditions are the only essential ones, or that any others must be present equally on all occasions, or at least with every fairly-disposed "sitter." To begin with, this absolutely excludes, a priori, two spiritualistic explanations, or hypotheses. For if the agency be that of a will which is neither our own nor the medium's, and of the nature or motives of which we know nothing, its design or its caprices must be quite beyond our control. We can equally conceive a purpose regulating these phenomena with a wisdom and foresight comprehending, as we cannot comprehend, the conditions of human progress; and a tricky, or sportive, spirit, amusing itself with our perplexities, and giving or withholding purposely to increase them. I am far, indeed, from advancing either of these suggestions as my own hypothesis to explain failures. They are merely among the possible conditions below the surface which we can conceive. The real ones are probably such as our psychology is still too immature to apprehend. But the fallacy in question supposes that our psychology is exhaustive, whereas, to a scientific mind, it should be evident that if these phenomena are genuine, a new and deeper psychology is required to explain them when they occur, and, therefore, to account for their non-occurrence when the apparent physical conditions are the same. We are beginning now to understand how small a part of real mental action and disposition belongs to the surface consciousness. That these phenomena depend largely on sub-conscious psychological conditions of the medium may be inferred from the apparent fact that to some extent they depend on his conscious condition. It is quite possible and probable that dispositions, emotional when conscious, may sink below the threshold, and thence impel or restrain occult agencies which either belong to, or are in intimate sympathy with, the medium. If, for instance, Mr. Eglinton had ever received the impression that the Society for Psychical Research were going to sit in suspicious judgment on him, or if (to suppose a case) he had ever been treated dictatorially by one of its prominent representatives, who can say that resentment, even after it had ceased to be a conscious emotion, might not remain as an adverse disposition in direct variance with that by which he might sincerely believe himself to be actuated?

Unfortunately, all suggestions of this sort must be too crude and conjectural to do any justice to the principle of judgment they are intended to illustrate. All we can say is, that the very undertaking to investigate this subject, or profession of interest in it, should imply recognition of our ignorance of the most important conditions. That, I am confident, is the disposition with which the leaders of the Society for Psychical Research approach the question, and we shall probably not find these gentlemen attaching undue importance to their failures with Mr. Eglinton, the impression of which I hope may be effaced by future success. I have sat with Mr. Eglinton in company with some of them on several occasions, with completely negative results under apparent conditions precisely the same as those which had formerly been attended with the most remarkable success. The demand for "scientific" investigation, put forward in ignorance, apparently, of the usual course of proceeding at the séances, and the supposition that only persons of very superior acumen, or of trained habits of minute observation, are competent witnesses, would not survive a single experience of the slate-writing under ordinary conditions. I do not, of course, mean by this that the investigator would not require to repeat the experiment, probably often, before committing himself to a final judgment. But it would be seen at once that the conditions are not such as a conjurer requires to deceive a fairly intelligent spectator. If, when Mr. Eglinton returns, any conjurer will go with me to his rooms, and after taking note of all the conditions of a séance, will write on a slate, or change a slate (of the size of those used by the medium), under similar conditions before my eyes, without observing it, I will give him a hundred pounds.

Mr. Eglinton is aware, by means of a very curious communication, that I went to him at first for this slate-writing in anything but a confiding disposition. And that fact makes me more anxious to testify publicly to his perfectly simple and straightforward conduct at all these séances I have attended with him. I do so again, leaving my testimony to be taken for what it may be considered worth.

One word more as to the relation of the Society for Psychical Research to Mr. Eglinton, and to "Spiritualism" generally. I do not see how the Society can adopt either of Mr. Haughton's alternatives at present, unless it is to fall into the very error he denounces, of treating merely negative results as justifying an adverse judgment. As regards the whole general question of the spiritualistic phenomena, it must, I think, be sufficiently apparent from the letter you publish from Mr. Myers, that the Society is prepared to consider affirmative testimony to them, past, present, and future, just as it considers testimony to the other phenomena already engaging its attention. When the time comes, I have no doubt that my own evidence, and that of more important witnesses, will be duly weighed. I hope, indeed, that the Society will not proceed too slowly, so as ultimately to find itself in the somewhat ludicrous position of assuring a world that is already convinced. Meanwhile, I am able to declare most confidently, from full opportunity of judgment during the past three years, that suggestions of prejudice in the minds of the most active leaders of the Society against these phenomena, are utterly unfounded. In ordinary cases I should naturally not be willing to associate myself with men who could not implicitly accept my testimony upon matters of fact within my personal experience. But in this region no sensible person would dream of making such a demand upon his friends. The question must be narrowed to one of mere veracity before that will be possible. And we must remember that of unveracity there are all shades, the faintest of which, consistent, perhaps, with a rough measure of honesty for all usual purposes, may invalidate testimony of this peculiar character. It is always difficult to say where moral unveracity shades off into the inaccuracy which has its origin in defects of intellectual habit or temperament.

And so we must be patient. For my own part, I expect the general recognition of these facts as much from the operation of larger intellectual causes as from actual demonstration. Mr. Lecky has shown that the tendency to incredulity which set in towards the close of the seventeenth century, and which is now, perhaps, passing its climax, was quite irrespective of evidence, and was so automatic in character that some of the most acute and powerful minds of the age would do no more than maintain their own independence in presence of it.* It seems to me that the reaction is already observable, and that with the gradual suppression of an insuperable presumption against unseen agencies, the mass of testimony to them will recover its relative weight. Its cumulative force is still practically ignored, but we may say with Le Maistre, "Le dix-huitième siècle dure encore; mais il va finir."

Mr. J. G. Meugens, who is well known to many of our readers as a warm and devoted Spiritualist, has just arrived in England from India. We are glad to hear that he purposes making a stay of a few months before returning to Calcutta.

MR. EGLINTON'S SLATE-WRITING.

By H. WEDGWOOD, VICE-PRESIDENT S.P.R.

So many writers have borne witness, in the columns of "LIGHT," to the genuineness of Mr. Eglinton's slate-writing that I have thought it needless to add my voice, although my experiences have, I think, not been less decisive than any of those previously published. But now I am induced to come forward by seeing that stress has been laid on his want of success when sitting with a party of members of the Society for Psychical Research, as if any amount of negative evidence could derogate from the weight of facts solidly established on positive testimony. The Society for Psychical Research have no patent for accurate observation. Their testimony should have just as much and no greater weight than that of any other trustworthy witnesses. The peculiar value of the slate-writing test depends upon the extremely simple conditions under which it is exhibited, so as to render fraud conspicuously impossible in the case of a moderately observant witness.

The first experience that I shall notice took place some years ago, when Mr. Eglinton was staying with Dr. Nichols in Popstone-road. I took with me a pair of my own slates which I had tied up with string passing twice across the long and once across the short side of the slates, sealing them on the edges at the six points where they were crossed by the string. We sat in the dark, but on this occasion did not succeed in getting anything written on my slates. Two or three months later I took the same slates as I had tied them, and gummed the edges all round with postage paper, so as to exclude the possibility of inserting a tool, however fine, at any point. We now sat under the gas-light with the gas turned low, but with light enough to see each other clearly, as well as the slates laid flat on the table between us and covered by our four hands, Mr. Eglinton's as well as mine, which were never removed from them. After a while, the well-known sound of slate-writing began to be heard, and putting down my ear to the slates and withdrawing it again there could be no doubt that it was from them that the sound proceeded. I remarked to Mr. Eglinton on the painful amount of bodily effort he seemed to be exerting, which appeared strange to me, as I thought that whatever influence he could exert in the matter must be purely the result of mental effort. When the slates were opened, the seals and gummed paper remained unbroken. Three separate messages were written on both sides, containing seventy-five words in all, in three different hands, neatly written in even lines, with all the dots and accents correctly placed (one of the messages being in French), and each handwriting kept consistently throughout the message. One sentence was written with soft slate-pencil, the others had the appearance of being written with a blunt metallic point. The morsels of slate-pencil that had been put in rawly broken, had plainly been worn as if with writing. One of the sentences seemed to be in answer to my remark on the effort it appeared to cost Mr. Eglinton: "We managed to produce what you require, but with great difficulty and stress upon the medium."

My next instance is a case of writing between the leaves of a closed book, where the difficulty is carried one degree further than that of writing in the empty space inclosed between the rims of a pair of slates. It was in the autumn of 1883, soon after Mr. Eglinton had moved to Old Quebec-street. I was one of a party of eight, sitting round the table, with the gas full on. Mr. Eglinton gave me a blank card, from which I tore off a corner and kept it in my pocket. He put the card in a book, together with a morsel of black lead, and, turning to a sitter on his right, laid the book on the table, with both their hands on it. As nothing ensued, Mr. Eglinton removed the book, and laid it between him and me, and we placed our hands on it. Shortly after, having had the usual notice of three little taps that the writing was accomplished, I opened the book, and on the card I had placed there blank a few minutes before, I found a short letter addressed to me in a well-known and very peculiar handwriting, "Did you get my letter?" In fact, I had received the letter alluded to only just before starting from my house for the sitting, and so had it in my pocket to show my fellow-sitters. There could not be a doubt of the identity of the two handwritings and signatures. I had not mentioned nor shown the letter to anyone, nor was the person through whose hand it was written (unconsciously as I believe) aware of my intention to sit with Mr. Eglinton. Nor, conversely, did the latter know anything of my communications with my mysterious correspondent.

There was no trace whatever of black lead on the page of the book opposite to the card, although, of course, the fragment used in writing the card must have rubbed with equal force on the opposite page. I have still the card with the fragment I tore off; the corner accurately fitted on to it. The last instance that I will mention was one in which Mr. Eglinton's famous pair of locked slates was made use of. We sat as usual at the corner of his table, in full light. After showing me the very neat contrivance in question, shutting with a spring lock, Mr. Eglinton gave me a blank card, on one corner of which I wrote my initials, and shut the card up between the slates, putting the key in my pocket. The frame was then laid on the table between us, each of us placing one hand upon the frame while our other two hands were clasped together over the table. In a short time, on receiving notice that the task was accomplished, I unlocked the slates, and found drawn upon the card, which I had put in five or ten minutes before, quite a graceful sketch of a female figure floating in the air, and holding back her hair with both hands, with shading enough to show the fore-shortened limbs. It was drawn on the same face of the card with my initials, so that I could not possibly have overlooked it if the drawing had really been on the card when I shut it up in the frame, unless indeed (as some may perhaps suppose) I was biologised into partial blindness, whatever satisfaction may be found in such an explanation.

HARRY KELLAR.—The Religio-Philosophical Journal states that Harry Kellar, whose statement we have repeatedly published, is now endeavouring to make money by "exposing" what he once declared that he was "unable to explain by any natural means": phenomena in the production of which "there was no trickery in any form." This was his opinion while he was in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, the medium in whose presence these things occurred. This was his voluntary statement. Since then he has seen "money in it," and has "ratified" accordingly. Now, he will "duplicate any performance given by mediums of whatever nature, after he has been allowed to see it done three times." Philip sober and Philip drunk—which shall we believe? Probably it would depend on circumstances—on what line of action would pay best. Of one thing our readers may rest assured: Harry Kellar cannot duplicate one single phenomenon that occurs in the presence of an honest medium—unless he is a medium himself.

The Christian Messenger, an Australian journal, published recently an article on "Ghosts," not intended, the editor says, "to destroy faith in the supernatural, but in superstition." In the succeeding number it had a communication of two columns on Bible Ghosts and the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism; and a leader denouncing it as "a dark and distinctive enchantment," a black art forbidden in the Bible, stained with vile deceptions which have driven a considerable number into immorality and insanity—"as if an insane person could be immoral! Finally, this pious Australian tells us that "to hanker after these manifestations, and with foolish eagerness place ourselves in all kinds of unnatural and hysterical attitudes to obtain them, will only lead us into fearful regions of evil. Modern Spiritualism is of little or no service to humanity. Our Lord taught that these spiritual apparitions would not even convince the sceptical of the truth of religion, for He said, 'If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.'" And yet the same wonderful journal told us that these strange phenomena destroyed Materialism and proved the existence of mind and God!

SPIRITUALISM AND THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The letter of Mr. F. W. H. Myers, in reply to that of "X," in last week's "LIGHT," shows that he possesses a candid mind and one willing to admit a demonstrated truth.

But he will pardon me when I say that he makes use of a false analogy when he likens the researches which have taken place in regard to the etiology and treatment of typhoid fever, to those which have been made to demonstrate whether there are, or are not, means of communication between the visible and the invisible worlds. In the case of the disease, there has never been any question from the first whether there does, or does not, exist an assemblage of symptoms which it has been agreed to call typhoid fever—the facts are universally admitted, and the whole object of research is to gain more and more accurate knowledge as to these facts in all their bearings.

But in the case of Spiritualism, all the elementary facts are refused belief; they are asserted to be frauds.

The analogy would hold if typhoid fever were a disease newly introduced into England, and which had only been observed by a very fractional part of the medical profession, and if when this fractional part published their observations the remainder refused to listen to their statements, told them that when they stated the temperature of the patient was so and so, the thermometer must have been out of order, or that it had previously been deliberately held to the fire; when they described certain rose-coloured, particular shaped spots as appearing on the patient's skin, declared that such a thing had never been heard of before, was quite impossible and totally opposed to the laws of nature, and when invited to examine the cases for themselves, indignantly refused to waste their time about such nonsense.

Whilst addressing you on this subject may I take the opportunity of alluding to another?

I refer to the phrase now so frequently met with in spiritual periodicals, "Matter passing through matter."

This is really a very unscientific use of terms.

Inasmuch as matter is recognised by all physicists as of three forms, solid, liquid and gaseous, it is evident on slight reflection that matter is constantly passing through matter in the ordinary course of nature, or more strictly speaking between the particles of it; in every movement of our own bodies we are passing through the matter of the air, as the fish does through the matter of the water. Of course, what is meant to be implied by the term to which I refer is the phenomenon of solid matter passing between the particles of other solid matter, without leaving any visible lesion behind.

As it is better not to give any handle of offence that can be avoided, to hostile scientists, say of the Lankesterian school, could not some of our Greek scholars coin us a single word to express this phenomenon, just as psychography expresses a particular manifestation? Mr. Podmore's learned friend might be appealed to; but supposing no one to be equal to the task, or that the term might prove too cacophonous, I would suggest that writers in future should speak of "Solids passing through solids."—I am, sir, yours, &c. M. D. (LOND.)

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—The next conversation of the Alliance will be held on Friday, April 24th, in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, when Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, will deliver an address, his subject being "There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in our philosophy." We hope members and friends will take note of this engagement, and hold themselves free to be present on the occasion.

THE TELEPATHIC THEORY.

By G. WYLD, M.D.

It appears to me that the general argument in "X's" letter is sound, and that the telepathic theory has been adopted more in deference to materialistic prejudices, than because it is in harmony with spiritualistic facts.

I think we should have a precise definition of what is meant by the term telepathic.

I understand it to signify, that mental operations produce certain brain waves, the result of central vibrations, and that those vibrations, independently of the organs of the senses, can convey mental pictures to other brains, by these exciting identical vibrations.

We believe that vision is the result of vibrations impinging on the pupil of the eye, being by the lens concentrated on the retina and thus conveyed to the brain. So also hearing is the result of vibrations, acting on the inner membrane of the ear, being mechanically conveyed to the brain.

We find, however, that if cotton wool be packed into the outer cavity of the ear, the hearing is reduced to a confused hum, and if cotton wool is held over the eyes, sight is reduced to a dim obscurity.

The popular observation on this is, that opaque and dense substances intercept light and sound, but the scientific explanation is, that these interposed substances obliterate sight and hearing, by refracting, breaking up, and scattering the rhythmical vibrations, necessary to clear sight and hearing.

These facts seem to me to offer considerations of much importance in relation to the theory of brain waves and telepathic action.

As to the brain, we find that it is, except through the orifices of the senses and nervous system, separated from the external world by nine coverings of various textures and densities. 1. A fine membrane which adheres to its surface. 2. A thick strong membrane which encloses it. 3. The skull, which is composed of three layers, viz., a dense inner layer, a spongy form middle layer, which is full of blood vessels, and an outer bone case. 4. A strong fibrous covering external to the skull. 5. The scalp, which has two layers. 6. The hair of the head.

There are thus nine layers of various densities, and of, therefore, various refracting powers, protecting the brain against all minor vibrations from without, and scattering and obliterating all internal vibrations, arising in the brain itself, which might escape otherwise than by the orifices of the senses.

If then, we with cotton wool, close vibratory access to, and exit from, the eyes, the ears, the nose, and the face, it would seem impossible for any definite vibrations or brain waves to escape from or to enter the brain, and yet under these circumstances the clairvoyant and thought-reader know the condition of external things.

It would seem as if Nature took elaborate pains, to isolate the brain as a silent house, for the mind to occupy, in order that it could the better, as an autonomic power, hidden in its camera obscura, secretly concoct, and silently transmit and receive, independently of physical vibrations, its spiritual telegrams.

If so, then it seems to me, excluding the senses, there can be no necessity for, or possibility of, telepathic thought-transference.

I must thank Mr. Gurney and Mr. Myers for their courteous replies to my letter in "LIGHT."

A soft answer not only turns away wrath, but it almost disarms criticism; still I hope I may be permitted to say that I do not find my views materially answered by the respondents.

My position virtually was, that the telepathic theory had been adopted without sufficient proof, that it had been pushed to an unreasonable length, and that it logically led to Materialism.

In agreement with Mr. Gurney I admitted that some automatic writing might be the product of an external human impulse, but my opinion was that Mr. Myers had not given sufficient data for his belief that the vast proportion of automatic writing could be accounted for on his telepathic theory; and I cannot follow Mr. Gurney when he indicates that a ghostly visitor, such as is described in the July number of the Nineteenth Century, could possibly be explainable on that theory.

A ghost is there described as entering the chamber of a judge while he lay in bed beside his wife; an hour after the author of the ghost had died.

The judge held with this ghost a persistent and angry altercation, and finally drove the ghost out of the room, and I am asked to believe that all this might have been the result of certain cerebrations, operating an hour after the brain which cerebrated was dead. I could not force myself to believe in such a thing, even to oblige my best friend.

I made a mistake in saying that all thought-readers believed in the spiritualistic theory, but I still think I am right in saying that test thought-readers are all more or less sensitives, mediumistic, and clairvoyant.

I repeat—the Society for Psychical Research has done great service in solidifying the scattered results of the willing-game, much of which is now worked without contact.

When I said that the Society for Psychical Research carefully excluded from its printed reports the names and opinions of those expressing opinions at variance with the telepathic theory, I did not allude to written matter, but to oral remarks offered at the meetings of the Society.

It is true that in Part VI. of the Society's transactions the telepathic theory is presented in a refined psychophysical attitude; but one may ask why the term telepathic is preferred to the term tele-psychic? And I still say that the accepted term has a physiological origin, and therefore logically leads to materialistic conclusions.

Mr. Myers would advocate a prolonged experimentation on the lines of the telepathic theory, because he finds innumerable volumes have been written on the far less important subject, typhoid fever. But when we know that there are about 200,000 medical men in Europe and America all struggling to distinguish themselves, we can find an excuse for innumerable réchauffés in the form of medical monographs; although all that is known regarding typhoid fever can be given within thirty octavo pages, or within the ten large pages of one of the latest scientific works—"Quain's Medical Dictionary." Therefore I think immeasurable medical literature should be regarded rather as a warning than an example.

The Society must have in its drawers an immense collection of ghost stories—authenticated first-hand. Why not give us a volume of these? The book would be most interesting, and would be a solid contribution to psychical research.

We do not, however, require more telepathic ghosts, but real, objective, and persistent ghostly identities.

At the Convention at Waterbury, Vermont, October, 1884, Dr. Provo related the case of Mr. Curtis Turner, pronounced by several physicians to be beyond recovery from chronic broncho-pneumonia; but who did recover thoroughly under spirit-control and prescription. Since then he has been a healing medium for the same controlling spirit, who says he was a French physician named Hanibal. Under his influence Curtis Turner talks French, and plays the violin, neither of which can he do in his ordinary state.—Facts.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The spirited Spiritualists of Blackburn have built, opened, and consecrated a new hall for their meetings and services. As usual Lancashire is well to the front, and the smaller towns are much easier to move than the congeries of towns which we call the Metropolis—mother of cities; which, going on as now, threatens to become the largest densely peopled area in the world. In all this area with its five millions, soon to become ten millions, the first Spiritualist temple is yet to be built.

Liverpool will follow Blackburn, and spirited Newcastle, with such a solid, downright, thorough-going scientific Spiritualist as Mr. Barkas, may not be far behind. His contributions to the body of facts are above all praise—because they prove one thing of two; either that a most estimable, learned, and respected gentleman is an idiot or a rascal—a knave or a fool—or that Spiritualism is a fact, and a most stupendous reality.

Secularists, in some ways, are more likely to become Spiritualists than ordinary Christians are. Those who take a prominent and active part in teaching Materialism tie themselves up, no doubt, and may be as much bound and blindfolded as some Christians are—but they profess free inquiry and boast of free thought; many Christians denounce both as the rankest heresy. Then it is often easier to fill an empty vessel than to empty a full one.

We have little to hope for from the enlightenment of bigots of any creed or no creed. We have no doctrines to teach—no thirty-nine or other magic number of articles to sign. All we have is a body of facts and innumerable testimonies to their reality—facts which may be observed from day to day, proving to all open-minded men the greatest of all facts—that there is life beyond the grave.

This one fact, held by the great mass of the human race in all known ages, is Spiritualism. The phenomena of what we call "Modern Spiritualism" come as an answer to the materialism which denies the possibility of spirit-life and agency. The tiniest rap upon a table—the smallest movement of any material object—may be proof of spirit-existence and evidence of spirit-power. One name, written in a familiar handwriting, which we hear and feel, but which no one but a spirit could possibly inscribe, may be all we need to perfectly convince us of the great facts of spirit-life and spirit-power.

The utterances of the Rev. W. H. Black, A.M., of St. Louis, U.S.A., on "Modern Spiritualism" have been copied in the Cumberland Presbyterian. He says that "according to the estimates of the keenest investigators, there are from seven to eleven millions of Spiritualists—more devotees of this hag of the night than there are followers of the Pope in America." "Hag of the night" is rather a nice epithet to fling in the face of a fact you want to disparage. Mr. Black is hysterical—to which we have not the least objection.

The cause is confessed in the next sentence. Spiritualists "are diffused through all circles and seriously menace the Church"—whatever that, in the view of a Presbyterian, may be. Professor Phelps says the pulpit ought not to ignore Spiritualism; Professor Christlieb, on the banks of the Rhine, says the same. The most commanding voice of recent times, says "Beware."

"Beware!" also is good, if this reverend denouncer of the Science of Immortality could understand it—but he doesn't, and he goes on to lay down the law. He says:—

"With reference to this gigantic heresy, three things should be borne in mind:—

1. Spiritualism is underlaid with many indisputable facts. It is not all fraud.

2. All is not fact that is alleged as such in the name of Spiritualism. Much is perpetrated in its name which leading Spiritualists themselves denounce.

3. All facts are not wholesome."

Here we take issue. There is no fact in the universe which, duly considered and rightly used, is not wholesome. The mischief of all sectarianism is to pick out such facts as suit them, and sturdily to reject all others. Ignoring facts keeps men in ignorance and false doctrines. "Prove all things" is as much a command as "hold fast to that which is good."

Then the Rev. Mr. Black tells in his way the story of the Fox girls and the materialising of spirit forms, "as in the case of Mr. Livermore, the New York banker, and others, who saw their deceased wives." He gives a case in 1854 of C. B. Sanders. "He wrote with materials out of sight (though not out of reach), exactly following the lines on the paper. He foretold events near at hand. He saw things far away, and out of reach of natural vision. He heard sermons which were being preached miles distant. He wrote and interpreted languages unknown to him in his normal state. He always acted in these trance-spells or 'sleeps' as they were called, as a different person from C. B. Sanders, invariably signing himself 'X + Y = Z.' He had powers of healing, so that he was ultimately called 'Dr. Sanders.' These facts are certified by many witnesses of social, medical, and theological standing."

Mr. Sanders, however, was not a Spiritualist, says Mr. Black, but had all his communications from persons still in the flesh, "therefore—1. Preternatural mental phenomena are not to be taken as evidence of Spiritualism. It does not require this heresy to explain mind-reading, telepathy, and many other unexplained mental phenomena; and 2. Communication with invisible persons does not prove that those persons are disembodied. Mr. Sanders got information from those who were far distant, but never, as we are informed, from the spirits of the dead."

Also all that is alleged of Spiritualism is not fraudulent—at least cannot be proved to be. Careful scientific investigators like Zollner, Crookes, and Wallace have affirmed that there are facts in Spiritualism yet to be accounted for. Wallace, the discoverer of the law of evolution, classifies the phenomena of Spiritualism as physical and mental. He names six kinds of physical phenomena: 1. Simple physical manifestations—such as raps, moving bodies, releasing mediums from bonds, &c. 2. Chemical phenomena—such as preserving from effects of fire. 3. Writing phenomena—such as inditing messages with materials out of reach of the medium, &c. 4. Musical phenomena—as when instruments are played without human hands. 5. Spiritual forms—as sparks, globes of light, hands, faces, &c., which are made to appear and perform unusual deeds. 6. Spiritual photographs—as when spirit-forms have appeared in pictures taken in the presence of a medium.

Of mental phenomena, Mr. Wallace says there are five kinds: 1. Automatic writing—as when the medium writes involuntarily, and often on themes and in languages to him unintelligible. 2. Clairvoyance and clairaudience—as seeing and hearing things imperceptible to the natural organs. 3. Trance-speaking—as when the medium, in a more or less unconscious state, speaks of things often beyond his own capacity. 4. Impersonation—that is, assuming the character of other beings. 5. Healing.

And after this testimony, unimpeached and unimpeachable, what is the result? What is the outcome of this "hag of the night"—this "pestilent heresy"? It is "an unalterable conviction of the reality of mind." It is that "Materialism can give no explanation of these strange phenomena. No mere atomic aggregations can account for these wonders. Only mind furnishes the data for the solution of such problems. They must be referred to something which overleaps the limitations of matter and performs deeds which are miracles to Materialism. But if mind be conceded, then the supernatural is involved, and that which involves the supernatural involves God. The conclusion of the whole matter, then, is God is."

Balaam again. He begins to curse and goes on to bless. The "hag" and the "heresy" prove mind and God. And so a bad beginning comes to a good ending.

In Memoriam.

CHARLES CASSAL.

By "M. A. (Oxon.)"

One by one, with increasing rapidity, and at intervals each of which seems appreciably shortened, the friends with whom the profession of a common faith has associated me are being gathered into their places in that state of life to which we are all travelling. The last—one of those whom we could least spare, as it seems to our clouded judgment—is the many-sided man whose name heads this notice.

It is not generally known to my readers of what eminence in various walks of life was the man whose modest simplicity of character caused him often to take a lowly place in a company where he was facile princeps.

Hugues Charles Stainislas Cassal was born in the year 1818 at Altkirch, Département du Haut-Rhin, Alsace. At the college at Altkirch he commenced his studies, and continued them in Dijon, where, in the year 1836, he took his Degree of Bachelier es Lettres.

He then proceeded to Strasbourg, where he took his Degree of LL.B. (Bachelier en Droit) in 1839, and LL.D. in 1840 (Université de France).

Down to the year 1845 he practised at the Bar. In that year he lost his father, and found himself at the head of a family of eight children, four of whom were sisters, and was thus compelled to take up his father's practice as a solicitor.

He was successively elected member of the Conseil Général du Département du Haut-Rhin; Mayor of Altkirch (1848); Représentant du Peuple for the Département du Haut-Rhin in the Assemblée Nationale in the Republican interest, by a large majority of votes.

Shortly before his mayoralty of Altkirch, advantage had been taken of the troubled time of the revolution of 1848 to oppress the Jews in some districts, and to wreck and pillage their houses. He was chosen to proceed to the disturbed districts for the purpose of quelling the disturbances. This he did successfully at great personal risk, and to the satisfaction of the Jewish community, which subsequently showed him many marks of gratitude.

While a member of the Assemblée Nationale he lived in Paris, and spoke and wrote on various subjects, among which may be mentioned a speech and series of articles in the Press demanding a Commission of Inquiry into the Practice of Usury in Rural Districts. Politically he belonged to the Republican Left. His seat in the Assembly was next to that of Lamartine, but Lamartine was not of exactly the same political couleur.

In 1851, at the Coup d'Etat, several unsuccessful attempts were made to arrest him. He was tracked during a whole fortnight in Paris. In company with Victor Hugo, Jules Favre, Arago, Eugène Sue, and others of the Republican Left, he had actively opposed the usurper, and had done his best to rouse the people. With these eminent men, and others less conspicuous, he was exiled by special decree. In the list of proscription his name came next to Victor Hugo's. He always regarded it as an honour to himself to be proscribed in such company.

He came, almost of course, to England, on January 28th, 1852, without resources of any kind, without even a knowledge of the language. This he picked up at first by reading the Times. He gave lessons, everywhere making friends, and finally was introduced to University College School, in 1856-7, by the late Professor Key, F.R.S., for whom he always entertained the greatest affection and respect. He was chosen to the Professorship of French in University College, in 1860. Before this important event in his career, he had already obtained the coveted post of Examiner in French to the University of London.

From that time his success was assured, and his progress rapid. It is pleasant to think that he was not forgotten in his own country, which he had always loved with undiminished affection. On July 12th, 1880, he was created Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, by decree of the President of the Republic "comme récompense de dévouement éprouvé à la cause républicaine et des services rendus aux intérêts Français en Angleterre."

He accumulated, during the three-and-thirty years that he spent in London, many distinguished posts, which are never filled except by men of the highest eminence in their profession. In addition to the post of Examiner to the University of London, he examined also for the Civil Service Commission, and for the Indian Civil Service; for the Staff College, the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Royal Military Academy. His name and fame had reached the Colonies, for he was appointed Examiner for the University of New Zealand. And, last, but by no means least, he had very recently been appointed Examiner in the newly-founded Victoria University, at Manchester.

This is not the place to recount the long list of his works, chiefly educational, nor to extend, as I might readily do, my narration of his public services. He was far more than I have been able to depict him in one of the walks of life which he adorned. He was admitted by common consent, as I can testify, to be one of the ablest teachers that University College can produce, and his weight of character, his directness of speech, his downrightness of purpose, were of inestimable value in the government of that institution.

A passing word only on his domestic relations, lest I seem to intrude, however respectfully, where a sacred privacy should prevail. No family ever mourned a parent whose love and devotion to them were more touchingly manifested throughout a long life, the friction of which might be held to excuse some variation of temper. His deeply religious mind—no man was ever, in the truest sense of the word, more religious; his high sense of honour, causing him to render to each his due; his generosity to any fellow-man in need; made his private life as striking by the display of moral qualities as his public life was striking by the superiority of his intellect.

It is, however, as a Spiritualist that we are most concerned with him. He was, here as elsewhere, simple, sincere, and earnest in his belief. He was a Spiritualist of

PLATE II.—SPIRIT DRAPERY.

The information I have obtained from various séance-rooms (or otherwise manifesting) "spirits," is chiefly to the effect that they possess this counterpart "naturally." Pressed to state, as far as their recollection enables them, how they became possessed of it "naturally," all invariably "break down," and tell me they do not know; or they (as is usually the case) evade further interrogation by putting counter-questions. They do not know, cannot explain, or have quite forgotten, when it was, or under what circumstances, they first found themselves endowed with the "counterpart." To them the mystery appears as great as it does to us. All they are aware of is that they possess it, and that, although it is visible or real to them, it is not perceivable to our senses. As to its transformation, the information given is that a (to us) solid substance can be produced out of this essential part by certain processes of which we cannot form any conception.

They further state that in their condition as "spiritual beings" they have the faculty of working out such a process, but cannot, because it is not natural to us, explain that faculty otherwise than by terming it "will-power." Mortals can, they say, only observe the results which, as we (mortals) are aware, fully demonstrate the reality of that power. The process followed is said to be that of "agglomeration" of the atoms present in this earthly atmosphere. These atoms being attracted to, or absorbed by, the spiritual basis, the latter can be seen gradually to assume the different phases of solidification (sometimes observed in the dim light at séances for physical manifestations) until the whole of the previously invisible basis or spiritual counterpart is transformed into the solid substance known as "drapery." Now, all this is conceivable, and has, moreover, been partially witnessed by scores of investigators; but we have still to learn whence that spiritual counterpart was originally derived. For it is evident that, in order to obtain such particular counterpart of an object, the object itself must, at one time or other, have been in the possession of the operator; unless it be assumed that the production of the material is a "creation." This, we know, is beyond the power of the "spirits," and has, besides, never been claimed by them. But for the absence of information respecting the origin of the counterpart, the theory is acceptable.

We now come to a somewhat different hypothesis, also based upon spirit-communications, which leaves the essential basis or spiritual counterpart out of the question altogether. According to it, the material of which the drapery is "formed," is produced by will-power, on the spot and out of the atoms collected in the medium's surrounding atmosphere, —some say the medium's "magnetism"; the process being likewise that of slow and gradual transition from the invisible to the substantial. Here we are obliged to infer that will-power is sufficient to explain the formation, not of some solid substance merely, but of a manufactured product, viz., woven cloth! But we cannot be expected to believe that atoms, molecules, or what else one may consider these things to represent, will shape themselves in long-spun threads, each thread twisted round hundreds of times and intercrossing other similar threads thousands of times, following a strictly mechanical arrangement of the most complicated nature, and all this without mechanical coma type that is becoming perhaps a little old-fashioned. His mental faculties did not stand in the way of a simplicity of belief that experience had not availed to modify. Perhaps he had not had time to climb up to the fashionable Agnostic platform. He knew, or he thought he knew, by evidence that satisfied his keenly critical mind, that those whom death hides from us are "not lost, but gone before"; that they live as really as they ever did; and that their power of communion with earth is a demonstrated fact. In that faith he rested content, leaving curious questionings to those who, as he said to me, "had more time to vex themselves with them." Yet he was anxious to "judge righteous judgment," for he borrowed from me all the printed particulars that I could lend him about the Theosophical Society, and was equally anxious to know of the Hermetic Society, and the distinctive professions of Thomas Lake Harris. Hardly a day passed, for we met daily except during vacation, but he came to me with some difficulty to settle, some problem that disturbed him, something in his reading of spiritualistic literature on which he thought I could throw light, for his own experience had been comparatively recent, and he was always learning and coming daily nearer to the knowledge of the truth. We agreed repeatedly that a study of every form of the Occult was a duty to ourselves, and a necessary preliminary to the expression of any opinion on a subject so perplexing and full of mystery as is that which we call Spiritualism.

He was a member of the Council of the London Spiritualist Alliance, where his genial presence and weighty counsel will be sadly missed.

I have now narrated such facts in my friend's life as will show by their bare recital what manner of man he was. I have given the skeleton; but who, even among those who knew him best, can reproduce the spirit that animated it, can show the man as he was, and fix by feeble words—the more feeble in my case that they are penned by one who has himself long been cast on a bed of sickness and extreme pain—the whole many-sidedness of Charles Cassal? To him as to few else apply the words:—

"He was a MAN, take him for all in all;
I shall not look upon his like again."

"M. A. (Oxon.)"

At a Council meeting of the London Spiritualist Alliance held on Tuesday, March 24th, a vote of sympathy and condolence with the family of the late Professor Cassal was unanimously passed on behalf of the President, Council, and members of the Alliance. Mr. A. A. Watts, the deputy-president, reported that, anticipating the wishes of the Council, he had sent a wreath of flowers, for use at the funeral, as a slight token of the esteem in which their co-worker was held by all who knew him. A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Watts for his action in the matter.

CAVENDISH ROOMS.

A soirée in commemoration of the thirty-seventh anniversary of Spiritualism was held at the Cavendish Rooms on Wednesday, March 18th, 1885.

After tea the business of the meeting was commenced by Mr. J. Burns, and, in the course of the evening, addresses were delivered by A. T. T. P., Mr. T. Everitt, Dr. J. Commodore Street, Mr. T. Shorter, and Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, the various speeches being interspersed by a well-arranged musical programme.

Through the courtesy of Mr. J. Burns, of the Medium and Daybreak, we have been favoured with advance proofs of the report of the proceedings. In making our acknowledgments, we have to express regret at our inability to use it, but have much pleasure in referring those who wish to read the various speeches to the current issue of our contemporary.

pulsion. Are we to ascribe a similar result simply to the superior power over matter with which these "spirits" are endowed? If the "spirit's" products were only a substance, in composition unlike the stuff we are able to manufacture, the above theory would seem more readily acceptable. Strange to say, the material worn by the "spirits" is, after careful examination, found to be intrinsically the same as the material we wear, and, what looks more mysterious, if not more surreptitious, is, that sometimes the edges are either cut straight or even hemmed.

But it may be asked whether the question as to its origin is worthy of the attention directed to it; or, whether it would not be preferable to abandon further research for the present, considering the insuperable obstacles that stand in the way of direct experiment, and also the comparatively secondary importance of the question to be settled. For it may be, and has been, argued that it matters little how, and when, the drapery was procured, provided the incontestable genuineness of a materialisation be proven. Certainly, if the "forms" were seen to materialise apart from the drapery; but the question is, do "forms" build up until fully developed and then go in search of some calico to cover themselves? From what has been witnessed, they do not; but appear either after, or simultaneously with, the drapery; e.g., the drapery is seen to develop or proceed, as a filmy substance, on, or near, the medium's person, the "form" arising from inside or underneath; or, drapery and "form" appear together by the gradual solidification of a seemingly cloudy mass. Hence there is no need for either the supposition, or the deductions made from it; furthermore, as a pretext to account for the presence of the drapery, it would induce, if not compel, one to suspect the medium or the circle of what to many will be equivalent to premeditated fraud. There is another difficulty anent this drapery production to which I wish to call special attention. The student of these mysterious "form"-manifestations will have experienced that not all such "forms" are distinct materialisations, but they are often (some opine nearly always) "transfigurations" or "transformations." In these latter manifestations we are not beholding a "form" or "spirit," individually distinct and existing apart from the medium, but the medium himself transformed. And, these transformed mediums appear likewise in drapery! Granted that in such cases the "spirit" is compelled to animate the medium's body to avoid an exhausting materialisation, or in consequence of some other cause that would prevent the operator from successfully carrying out that object. This at least is the adopted explanation of these enigmatical occurrences; but what explanation can be given of the presence of drapery in such particular case? Are we to suppose that if a "spirit" lacks the power to build himself a body, it is yet able to construct a large quantity of woven cloth? Why, if it be true that "spirits" manifesting on earth can, by will-power, transform a spiritual counterpart into a solid substance, why does not the transfigurator avail himself of that power? If some can, and others can not, why do those that are deficient to perform that work, come at all or exhibit themselves at all? Would it not be better to turn out the medium as they find him? Were it not that transformations are known to have occurred outside the séance-room, as in some rarer cases of ecstasy—these manifestations might be considered a fraud. However, without imputing any blame on the medium's part, can the same be said of the "spirit" animating the medium's body by trying to pass him off as some one else? Now as to the drapery. Does not its origin—especially in the present case—directly point to "earth"? I therefore submit that the question as to the origin of spirit drapery is worthy, nay, most urgently demands, the most serious attention of all those interested in the subject.

IMPROMPTU REPLIES THROUGH A LADY PSYCHIC OF VERY LIMITED EDUCATION.

III.

BY T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

(Séance August 23rd, 1875. Present: Two ladies and six gentlemen.)

While we were in conversation the hand of the medium wrote, "I have arrived, what can I do for you first?"

QUESTION. Will you kindly give us the information you promised to us on Monday evening last, as to your condition and the general arrangement of affairs, in the sphere in which you now dwell? That statement would be of great interest to all of us.

ANSWER. I will commence with my experience on first entering my new life.

Q. Thanks, we shall be glad to learn it.

A. I told you before that the last nine years of my life were years of pain, and agony, and suffering so exasperating that I looked and longed for death as the only means of relief from my sufferings.

Notwithstanding my German education, I had never taken kindly to pneumatics or metaphysics, and had really troubled myself not at all about the future. To my mother and sister I owe all the good in my nature, and when I once spoke to my mother as to the preparation necessary for the future, she said, "Live, my son, so that when you leave the earth, you may leave nothing to regret behind. Be honest, truthful, and courageous; this is the preparation I advise."

During the last few days of my life I suffered extreme anguish, and my mother was once sitting at my side, and when I made a moan of complaint, she cheered me by saying, "You will soon be free."

I blessed her then, as I have done since, that nothing in her words or manner made me afraid to die. I remember, after this, sinking into a stupor, but I can still feel the kiss on my brow, and the words, "He is going." Directly after that the pain ceased, and I felt—how can I describe the exquisite pleasure, the intoxicating delirium, that took possession of my whole body? I can only liken it to the beatific trance of the opium eater.

I was aroused from this trance by a form, which bade me come, and then I knew for the first time that I had died.

(At this stage the hand of the medium ceased writing, and I wrote.)

Q. You have now favoured us with your account of your entrance into the other state; will you please to give us some of your experiences when there?

A. I remember wishing that my mother knew that the suffering was all over, but when I turned to tell her I found that I was in a strange place, with an old man standing, looking pityingly, beside me. I said, "I want to speak to my mother," but he replied, "Not yet; come!" so I followed him over hills, and through valleys, the while drawing such breaths of pure air that every draught I inhaled seemed to give me life, strength, and happiness.

We came to a city, a city not built with hands, and such as I cannot describe. It was the very perfection of the architect's ideas.

We wandered through it, and I saw a group of men discussing some weighty matter, and when I came nearer I recognised some of the grand old heroes whom I had thought and spoke of with reverence during my life, and I involuntarily bowed myself before them.

I enjoyed some exchange of words and ideas with them, and I found that they inhabited this beautiful place, not for the deeds for which the world remembered them, but for the self-denial and self-sacrifice for which they had received no thanks while on earth.

After a while my guide beckoned me to follow him again, and we proceeded over more hills, fertile plains, and by streams sparkling as they flowed through the rich verdure, and we came to another city, village, what you will, and we saw hundreds of little children. "This," said my guide, "is the children's village, and these women are the mothers who have left their own on earth, and who undertake the care of the little ones. You see how great the sympathy between them, how fondly each loves the other. These children will grow in wisdom and understanding, and will take their places among men."

Then we passed on and stood in a company of men; painters, writers they had been, but these great masters of the earth, how low have they fallen, when compared with those who starving (!starved) on earth for want of patronage. We spoke to all, and I recall with pleasure how each had some kindly word for the stranger.

"Where," I asked my guide, "are the philanthropists, those men whose names stand high for their works of charity?"

"This way," said my guide, so we turned and came lower, and lower, and lower, and saw a great multitude of men listening to the teachings of one who, when I came nearer, I recognised as one of England's greatest philanthropists there continuing the work to raise those who on earth had not tried to raise themselves.

"These," said my guide, pointing out to my notice some of the multitude, "are your kings, your rulers, your statesmen; how low they are; see there in the rank above them are the poor, the beggar, who, by reason of his greater aspiration after good, is higher than kings or princes. These, again, are those who were idiots and insane; these are among the most promising of that vast multitude; see how eagerly they devour the knowledge that was denied them on earth; they come among us pure as the veriest infant."

(Here the writing ceased, and I wrote.)

Q. We shall be glad if you would proceed with your description (to which the following reply was written through the hand of the medium):—

A. I would rather, now that I have introduced the subject, that you would ask what questions you wish information upon. This is a difficult subject to deal with, since I must use a metaphor all through, but I keep to the truth in every particular.

Q. Have you and your companions in the spiritual world visible organised human forms?

A. We have visible organised forms, but such forms as you, in your present form, would not recognise. You see your friend and know him to be your friend, and so do we, when we see the spirit of our friend, know him to be our friend in the same manner that you recognise yourselves. Yes, if you were to see us, you, with your material eyes, you would not recognise us. I can liken it only to this—the butterfly would not recognise in the chrysalis a fellow-creature; we do not see the form but the spirit, and recognise our friends by it.

Q. Are our organs of vision the same as yours, and do you see, by some kind of ether, as we are supposed to do?

A. It does not require eyes to see even on earth; sight is independent of the eye even there, I believe. You can convey impressions to the brain in many ways.

Yes, we have organs answering the same purpose in every particular that you have; but as to the ether particles, I cannot tell. I never thought about the matter, but I will inquire and tell you more.

Q. Do you partake of food for the purpose of supplying the requirements of your spiritual bodies?

A. Do you give your brain food? We feed our bodies on the same food as you do your brain. We eat it as you would, digest it, and cast away the more worthless.

Q. Do you move rapidly from place to place, and how?

A. We move from place to place rapidly or otherwise by the mere exercise of what you call will power. We wish to be in a place, and, if circumstances permit, we can be there with the wish: we, as it were, rid ourselves from the incumbrance of the body, and can travel even quicker through space than electricity.

Q. Is there a Heaven or a hell, or are there heavens and hells, and do those who leave this world go at once to either the one or the other? If not, what is their state?

A. I have never heard of the hell since coming here, but of Heaven I have, and that seems still above us. I think that the real meaning of the word (hell) is a pit or a grave; if that is so, then I imagine that the condition of some of the multitudes I have mentioned might be the hell, but I am not sure.

Q. Have you anything in your sphere equivalent to our time, and do you ever feel ennui or languor?

A. We have days, nights, and seasons similar to your own. We tire sometimes, but take rest, perhaps not in the same way as you, but in a way as well calculated to restore us.

Q. What is your mode of social intercourse?

A. We visit when we wish to interchange ideas, and get our friends to visit us. We spend much time in debating and organising schemes for raising the status of the lower in condition to ourselves.

Q. Have you any mode of worship, and, if so, what are your leading forms of worship?

A. We have as many, no, almost as many, forms of worship as yourselves. It is the employment of very many, but to greater use than on earth; by worshipping the Deity truly, we raise ourselves, and to do so truly, we must raise others, thus by our own deeds crowning ourselves and benefiting others.

Q. Do you meet with any beings designated angels? Have they any direct relationship to mankind, that is, were angels once men?

A. There are angels, but they belong to a much higher sphere than I am acquainted with; they are sent at times with messages to us, even as they have been to yourselves; but as to your question, were they once men, I believe that if they were, they never lived on earth; at least, such is the opinion of many here.

Q. Will you please to inform us with what sciences and with what languages you are acquainted, in order that we may ask questions in relation to those subjects with which you are more familiar?

A. Acoustics, light, heat, magnetism, electricity, principally, but of a few more. But of languages I know but little more than English. I certainly once knew German as well, but during my illness I let it go down. Still I might be able to recollect it if necessary.

Q. Is it necessary that Humner Stafford should be here present in order to control the medium, or can he control her from a distance?

A. Either; from a distance as the conditions permit; if every condition is not perfect, we can control from a distance but the communications are not to be depended implicitly upon. Frequently the aura or odic force, whatever you like to call it, is interrupted, so the control is not absolute; but when everything is harmonious and we control from the person to person, then the danger of interference is done away with.

Q. We shall be glad to know if it be agreeable to you to meet Mr. —, a celebrated musician, next Monday evening, as he is desirous of making your acquaintance, and he furnished me with several of the musical questions which I asked you to answer. If you agree to meet him, please to say if the conversation shall be on musical instruments, and if so, on which special instrument. Also please to inform us if you are pretty well acquainted with the most celebrated musical composers?

A. I have no objection to meeting any friend. My musical knowledge is limited, but what I know I am willing to impart. I best understand the organ, piano, and harmonium; the conversation can be on these or optics. I have been getting up that, so if you have any questions, I shall be glad to answer them.

I have not met with many musical composers, but with Meyerbeer and one or two others.

Q. Will you please to inform us as briefly as you feel disposed the difference between chromatic and spherical aberration?

A. By spherical aberration we mean the distortion of the figures or objects looked at through a spherical lens; by chromatic, the ring of colour round the object. (End of séance.)

Readers will please to remember that the replies to the questions were written by the lady medium with very great speed, a speed about double that of ordinary writing. The answers were written without hesitation or erasure of any kind. I have copied them verbatim from the original MS. book. Some of your marvellously-clever unbelieving readers, Messrs. Proctor and Lankester to wit, may suppose they are questions that may easily be answered by normal means, and that the medium is clever, and well acquainted with the topics introduced. I have already stated that the medium is only a very partially-educated woman. In order to test the alleged ease of the replies, let every sceptical reader first test his own powers on the questions in the three séances already given, by writing rapid impromptu answers to the questions, and when he has failed—as fail he probably will—let him test the skill and knowledge of a few hundreds of his well-educated friends, and he will speedily find that in comparison with the controlled hand of the partially-educated automatic medium, they will miserably fail.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC VIEW OF SPIRITUALISM.

The following is translated from a recent number of the Vienna Tagblatt, a democratic daily.

"Although Pope Pius IX. notoriously condemned Spiritualism in a solemn declaration, it now finds a remarkable advocate in the Papal paper, Civiltà Cattolica. This journal deals at length with the Archduke John's pamphlet on the exposure of Bastian, and with Spiritualism generally, and very decidedly opposes the proposition that that is not true of which one cannot be convinced by one's own eyes. The conclusions of the Archduke, founded on a single case with Bastian, this believing paper thinks, are not valid against Spiritualism in general. Plato speaks of the intervention of good and evil demons, quite like Allan Kardec, Du Potet, Flammarion, Baron Hellenbach, and the Spiritists of to-day. So, likewise, the Neo-Platonists Plotinus, Jamblichus, and others, speak of the art of obtaining intercourse with spirits, and of effecting the present so-called spiritistic phenomena. Every one knows the functions of the old Oracles (the Pythia being a medium). The Fathers of the Church, also, accepted spirit phenomena as generally known, and that in which Tertullian and Augustine believed cannot be described as simple fraud. Nor would mere charlatany have convinced Anselm, Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, and Scotus. Spirit phenomena occur also among the heathens, as missionaries testify. The Civiltà Cattolica promises to continue its certainly very interesting discussion of Spiritualism."

THE LATE MR. CHARLES PARTRIDGE.

The American Spiritualist Alliance convened a meeting in the Republican Hall, New York, for a service, February 8th, in commemoration of Mr. Charles Partridge, who passed to the higher life in January, in his seventy-second year. Mr. Newton president of the First Society of Spiritualists, presided.

After the singing and invocation and the president's opening speech, the assembly was addressed by Judge Cross.

He said that it was in the early days of the mediumship of the Fox girls, one of whom—Mrs. Leah Fox Underhill—was on the platform, that Charles Partridge first witnessed modern spiritualist phenomena. Feeling it a duty to make them known, with the philosophy deducible from them, he founded, with the late Dr. S. B. Brittan's editorial aid, the Spiritual Telegraph, and supported it through its nine volumes. Under the same impulsion he originated the Spiritual Conferences, which have been continuous to the present time. Charles Partridge believed in the power of organisation, and was the first to urge and help forward the organising of the American Spiritualist Alliance. It was his constantly expressed conviction that the religion of Spiritualism would bring about an end to the strife about creeds, and draw men together in fraternal concord.

Whenever an elevating charitable work was in hand, one might always expect to find Charles Partridge in it; he was—among other societies for good—one of the first in forming that for the Prevention of Crime; and he was the originator of our noble Orphan Asylum: of both of them he was on the Board of Trustees.

A few days before his departure he wrote to Judge Cross that he wished to convey to the American Spiritualist Alliance his books, and his estate on the shores of a beautiful lake in Lewis County, N.Y. The Judge went to take instructions for the necessary deed, but bodily weakness compelled its being deferred till next day. Then it was too late: the next day he entered the spirit world.

Mrs. Hardinge-Britten, said the departed had been her constant friend from the commencement of her mediumship, and concluded with an impromptu poem.

Judge Dailey followed. He held up the character of Charles Partridge as worthy of the contemplation of the rising generation of Spiritualists.

After Mrs. Brigham had recited a beautiful poem, which—like that of Mrs. Hardinge-Britten—could not be reproduced, the proceedings were terminated by the singing of the Doxology and a final invocation.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

GLASGOW.—Soirée of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists on Friday, 20th March, 1885.—This soiree was held on the date given, for the three-fold purpose of commemorating the thirty-seventh anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Mr. Morse's farewell visit to Glasgow, and the termination of the first six months' engagement by the Society of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis. The proceedings were of the most enthusiastic description, and the occasion may well be remembered as a "red-letter day" in the annals of the Glasgow Association. Mr. Jas. Robertson, president, occupied the chair, and around him on the platform were seated Mr. Morse (the guest of the evening), Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, Mr. T.F. Calder (of Dundee), Rev. Mr. Taylor (Unitarian pastor), Mrs. Taylor, Messrs. Griffin, Anderson, Duguid, and Munro. Tea having been served, and a piano duet gracefully rendered by Misses Wilson and Freebairn, Mr. Wallis, in normal capacity, read a brief, earnest, and stirring address in reference to the anniversary of Spiritualism, in the course of which he ably vindicated the mission of Spiritualism, advocated the cause of mediumship, and exhorted his fellow-labourers in the spiritual cause to elevated purpose and zealous effort. He said: "The realisation of the nearness of the spirit-world, the presence and influence of the loved of our hearts, the certainty which, beyond peradventure, is known to us that there is no death, the conscious reception of baptisms of love, comfort, advice, and healing, of ennobling inspiration, and soul-stirring revelations of Truth and Right—these should kindle in us answering fires of aspiration and enthusiasm, prompt us to nobler purposes, purer lives, and more earnest efforts for the spread of spiritual reform. For it is not enough to have a foundation: we must build upon it; and each working Spiritualist is a co-operator in the building of that temple of use and beauty whose project and plan have their source in the higher life." He characterised mediumship as "the central fact of Modern Spiritualism. Without mediums there could be no phenomena; neither message, nor vision, nor trance, nor love-light from the Unseen. "Spiritualism without the spirits would be like Hamlet without the ghost; and Spiritualism without mediums would be like Hamlet without the Prince, i.e., the instrument to execute the ghost's desires." In regard to Spiritualism, the need of the hour is for men and women who will recognise principles and devote themselves to them, bearing their individual cross the while with fortitude, fearless of consequences. The world needs workers whole-souled, strong and resolute, not mere professors and sentimental talkers. The solemn exhortation of duty is:—

"If you've any task to do,
Let there whispered be to you: Do it.
If you've anything to say—
True and needed—yea or nay: Say it.
If you've anything to love,
As a blessing from above: Love it.
If you've anything to give,
That another's joy may live: Give it."

The address was received with much applause. After a brief vocal and musical diversion, the chairman called on Mr. Munro to speak of the second object on the programme: Mr. Morse's arewell visit. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Munro took occasion to acknowledge the peculiar indebtedness he felt towards the labours of Mr. Morse and the teachings of his guides. He confessed that when he first heard of friend Morse's intention, and understood that he meant it seriously, he felt not a little dismayed, not to say distressed. It seemed to him that in the departure of Mr. Morse for far-off lands, the cause of Spiritualism in this country would be seriously crippled. He trusted such weak-kneed faith in the noble gospel they so nobly preached might be forgiven by Mr. Morse and those who guide and inspire him. Yet it was hardly possible to overestimate the value of the kind of utterance which they conjointly have given to the imperishable things pertaining to Spiritualism. The speaker supported this contention by relating his own experience, somewhat as follows:—When, time and time again, "the cause" went under a cloud; when contumely and slander wrought their utmost to disfigure its fair escutcheon with their ugly "bar sinister"; when discord within the movement, and hostile clamours without, threatened to overwhelm it altogether; when, in hours of weariness and disappointment, the influence of specious sophistries misadvised scientific argument, had almost undermined the citadel of solid fact which secured and guaranteed the speaker's most cherished convictions, it was with the deepest gratitude he had to acknowledge the sustaining efficacy of that steady white ray of spiritual teaching which was ever associated with the labours of Mr. Morse.

Again and again, when Spiritualism as a dispensation of truth from the higher life appeared to be utterly discredited, the speaker was able to recall the eloquence and wisdom of those who, through the inspired lips of Mr. Morse, upheld Spiritualism, in spite of the weakness of its adherents and the aspersions of its adversaries, as a revelation of the utmost importance to humanity. Not alone some lofty utterances of brave old "Tien," but also some sententious saying or flash of kindly and revealing humour from the "Strolling Player" was found at such moments to be potent enough to reassure and console. Referring to Mr. Morse's quitting London, the speaker said: "I am at a loss to comprehend the true purport of Metropolitan Spiritualism, still less to appreciate it. It would seem at times as if Spiritualism existed and the accredited organs of the movement were supported for the sole purpose of converting an odd member of the Society for Psychical Research, or still worse, for supplying occult conundrums for wisacres to explain—away! What can any modest provincial think of the London Spiritualists, who can get so engrossed with "Koot Hoomi" Occultism, so extravagantly wild over the subject of "Matter through Matter," or so abandoned in regard to "Money Challenges," to prove Spiritualism true, as to suffer one of the ablest and most eloquent ministers of the Gospel of the Spiritual Truth to depart from their midst, broken in bodily health and dejected in spirit, because of their sublime indifference? A recent correspondent to the journal, 'LIGHT,' referring to our friend now with us, said that 'in the opinion of many competent judges,' he 'is the finest trance-speaker in the world,' and added the following which, to my way of thinking, are words of strongest condemnation: 'He (Mr. Morse) was badly supported, simply because his guides told the whole truth, concealing nothing.' If that be so, it seems to me that the conversion of as many Laboucheres as there were pounds sterling in the challenge of Signor Damiani could hardly atone for it. But enough on that topic. I only pray with all my heart that the end in this instance may justify the means, and that our friend may return to us by-and-by with renewed vigour of body and mind, his mediumship the agency for grander inspirations than ever. In closing, I can assure Mr. Morse that he may at least count on the interest of his Glasgow friends and fellow-Spiritualists in all his doings in foreign lands; for we shall watch his progress, and rejoice in the success we fervently hope may attend his labours. To him and no less to his revered co-workers in the spirit, I say on behalf of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists with the most cordial fervour: Farewell and God speed!"—Mr. Morse, who on rising to reply was received with much enthusiasm, spoke in the easy, conversational style peculiar to him, and made some happy attempts to parry the compliments of the previous speaker; good humouredly defended Metropolitan Spiritualism, describing its leanings as towards the phenomenal rather than the inspirational, which of course was a very important bias, likely to be productive of important results. But for himself, he must work, and should betake himself in the direction where the field for labour lay, little heeding, except for the separation from many kind and trusty sympathies, how far he might wander. He gracefully recognised the friends he had in Glasgow, some of them amongst the oldest and truest of his attachments. In regard to the matter of his physical health, the change of climate and scene was an imperative requirement. He had the firm opinion of his guides that this was the only way he could recruit his scattered physical forces. He hoped that on his return six years or so hence he should find the circumstances of the Glasgow Association vastly improved according to its deserts, and the trusty workers, Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, still successfully labouring for the common cause.—The remainder of the proceedings must be briefly summarised in accordance with limited space. With respect to the Wallis engagement, it need only be said that the favourable remarks on that subject by Mr. Griffin were cordially endorsed by the meeting, which fact augured well for the continuance of the labours of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis in Glasgow. Brief trance addresses were delivered in the course of the evening by the guides of Mr. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, Mr. D. Anderson (a local medium of considerable promise); likewise short speeches by Rev. Mr. Taylor, Mr. Calder, and the chairman. The musical portion of the programme was charmingly sustained throughout. A ball followed under the direction of Mr. De Banzie, who kindly provided the music, and "the fun" was kept up with vigour till well on in the morning.—Sunday, March 22nd, crowded audiences assembled to listen to the guides of Mr. Morse, who spoke in the forenoon on the subject of "The Spirits and the use to put them to"; and in the evening on "The Gospel of Rest." On both occasions the utterances were equal to the best of these eloquent spirit teachers. The evening's effort was, in the opinion of the writer, to whom Mr. Morse is no stranger, almost the finest piece of sustained reasoning and impassioned oratory combined it has ever been his privilege to listen to. Surely the Glasgow Association will soon begin to show the good results of the recent "high time" they have been enjoying, in the form of efforts more vigorous than ever to further the cause of Spiritualism in this quarter. Next Sunday, after morning service, a general business meeting of the Society will be held to consider ways and means for future work.—Sr. Munro.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 10th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE TELEPATHIC THEORY.

By EDMUND GURNEY.

Dr. Wyld asks for a precise definition of our term "telepathic," and goes on to say what he understands it to signify. Our own definition, which we have given on a good many occasions, is, I venture to think, precise, and differs completely from Dr. Wyld's. The term is applied by us to all effects produced by one mind on another otherwise than through the recognised channels of sense. It no more implies any sort of physical affection than does the word "sympathy." In the first half of the word there is, no doubt, a certain philological inaccuracy, in respect of the cases where the two persons concerned are near to one another; for tele means distant. But it seems worth while to waive this objection, for the sake of obtaining a common term for all cases which have the fundamental characteristic that I have mentioned. (See Proceedings VI., p. 118.) The inaccuracy is, after all, less than at first sight appears; for distance is relative; and the two parties in a bond fide thought-transference experiment have this in common with two persons who are miles apart, that they are precluded from communicating with one another by physical signs.

Dr. Wyld proceeds to criticise the hypothesis of brain-waves. Personally, I am no special friend to that hypothesis, and am not concerned to defend it; but it certainly will not be refuted by the observation that the integuments of the brain are impervious to light and sound. Forms of matter which are opaque to the action of one physical force may be perfectly transparent to another. A sheet of plate glass excludes sound, but not light; a windowless chamber of thin wooden boards would exclude light, but not sound; and other substances which would oppose the transmission of both light and sound may be no obstacles at all to magnetic or electric action. It is in the latter form of force that nervous induction, if it exists, would probably find its nearest analogy.

MR. W. EGLINTON.—Just as we go to press we learn that Mr. Eglinton has returned to England. He has met with complete success during his tour and has much benefited by the change of air and scene.

MIND-READING.—M. Prosper Van Velsen, aged twenty-two, student of medicine at Malines, on holding the wrist, as in feeling the pulse, of a person, can tell his thoughts or where he may have hidden anything.—Le Messager.

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER," AND THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

A committee of the above Society having been appointed to investigate and report on my ring as now on Husk's wrist, and supposed to have been placed there by occult means (see "LIGHT," 7th February), Mr. Gurney and Professor Barrett, acting as said committee, examined my ring in situ, and agreed that "Their opinion was that though the ring in its present shape could certainly not be drawn off without considerable violence, if at all, yet if it were hammered or forced into a more convenient form, the insertion or withdrawal of the hand might be possible."

This ring has been seen on Husk's wrist by several hundred people, and with the all but universal belief, that to suppose such a ring could be removed intact from Mr. Husk's wrist, without more or less destruction of his hand, would be a manifest absurdity.

I have examined the ring and Mr. Husk's hand very many times, and have always said, it was manifestly ridiculous to suppose it could, without destructive violence, be removed, and I now say that the verdict published by Professor Barrett and Mr. Gurney is a self-evident absurdity, and I have just demonstrated it to be so.

I took the trouble this afternoon to go all the way to Peckham Rye to see Husk, and I took with me a ring I had made of strong twine, considerably larger than the iron ring in question; the iron ring having an internal diameter of 1.80in. by 2.625, the twine ring measuring as stretched in an ovoid-shaped wooden block, 1.80 by 2.75. This twine ring, although it of course fits into every minute surface of Husk's hand, cannot possibly be forced over his hand, and therefore, of course, my iron ring, however hammered or shaped, could not possibly be forced over his hand.

It is, therefore, shown that Mr. Gurney and Professor Barrett have not passed a correct judgment on this matter, and I now call on the Society for Psychical Research to appoint a fuller committee, and to make some attempt to deal with this problem like men of sound sense, anxious for the establishment of truth.

29th March.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

SPIRITUALIST LYCEUMS are now established in all the Australasian Colonies, and they have an organ called the Lyceum Leader, which is so much sought for by the public that it has reached a third edition.—Harbinger of Light.

CURES BY HUMAN MAGNETISM.—Dr. Ashburner, physician to a London hospital, wrote thirty years ago, that in his own experience magnetism had eased agonising suffering, cured cancer, rendered patients insensible to the surgeon's knife and to the sufferings of parturition, and had raised patients from typhus fever; that his own life had been saved by it after medical friends had, in consultation, pronounced him beyond recovery.

REMUNERATING MEDIUMS.—A correspondent in La Lumière writes:—"The reasons given against remunerating mediums are noble and elevated, and would command my agreement in practice, if the phenomena I desire, as an investigator, to witness, were adequately accessible through mediums in private life. Until they are, I shall, for my part, be always ready with my contributions to those mediums who give up their time and strength to enable me and other inquirers to witness and study psychical phenomena, to say nothing of the odium they incur from sceptics."

EXALTED SENSIBILITY.

A correspondent of the Sunday Mercury, New York, writes:—

"In company with Dr. Newton, of Honey Creek, Ogle Co., Ill., I visited Mr. and Mrs. Collins, about two miles from Dr. Newton's residence. Dr. Newton said that they had resided there for about ten years; that five years ago their son, James, then ten years old, had typhoid fever, and he lay unconscious for twenty-one days. On his recovery it was found that he had hyperæsthesia or exaltation of the senses. Among the instances Mr. Collins gave of his son's excessive sensibility was this: A month ago he had what seemed a dream, in which he perceived two men go by the house, saw them distinctly and heard their conversation. They had with them a great bundle, which they were going to hide. He thought the dream strange, and told it at breakfast. At noon some men came to the house who said they were in search of thieves who had, during the night, broken into a store of the village and carried off goods and money. The boy said he had dreamt of two men going by with a bundle as if stolen, and his description of them pointed to two men who had been seen about the place in the evening. He then remembered that in his dream he heard one of them say they had better hide in a deserted cabin at the foot of Peaked Mountain. They were apprehended there with the goods.

"The boy's own account of his singular faculty is that ever since his illness he was surrounded by an atmosphere extending to an uncertain distance, within which everything and person is as clear to him as if close at hand.

"My desire was to test it for myself, with my friend Dr. Newton, and the parents were willing.

"So, while I sat by the boy the Doctor went out, leaving the boy with me; and moment by moment he described what Dr. Newton did. He said that he saw him get into his buggy, and drive off to a certain spot, water his horse, take a case from his pocket and place it under the cushion, get into the buggy again and drive back. Here Dr. Newton stepped in and confirmed the boy's perceptions to the letter. Dr. Newton then went into another room. The boy reported his comparing his watch with the time-piece there, that he took up a statuette, examined it, and replaced it, all which the Doctor, on coming in, stated was quite correct.

"I then took a turn, Dr. Newton taking his seat by the boy's side, with the clock in front of them, and pencil and paper. I got into the buggy, drove a distance of 500 yards, turned about, backed the horse, drove on again, and returned, having been gone seventeen minutes. A time record had been kept of my doings, which was quite correct. In giving my own account I purposely omitted the details of one part of my experiment, but the boy had them written down. He said, 'But you got down where the cart road enters the wood, tied the halter to the old stump, walked up to the rock, and then back to the buggy.' This was strictly correct. I was quite satisfied with my test."

The correspondent says: "The operations of psychological laws have been observed in every age, but only by the light of false theology and superstition. I am therefore pleased at the prospect of a scientific committee investigating them."

SPAIN.—La Universidad (Madrid) is an organ of freethought—which in Spain really means Anti-clericalism—recognises Spiritualism as the basis for fresh reforms, holding that, however good Materialism may be in overturning, it cannot build up. Everywhere in Spain Spiritist circles, journals, and schools are being organised. The same may be said of all Spanish-speaking countries. In Carthage the Spiritists have long been making efforts to inculcate our philosophy among the unhappy inmates of the prisons. From these prison-disciples the Paro Espiritista acknowledges the receipt of a small sum in aid of the sufferers from the late earthquake.—Le Spiritisme.

"MIND-READING" IN AFRICA.

Under this title we have been favoured, by Dr. Bloede, with a translation of the following from Anton Stecker, the German explorer in Africa:—

"On the cessation of the war between Shoa and Tsdsham, I returned from the Galla country to the Emperor Johannes' camp, and there met again my old acquaintance, Medelek, the Shoa King, whom the Emperor had summoned to arrange peace with Tsdsham.

"At one of my visits to Medelek I heard surprising things about one of his officers, Levasha, the thief-finder, which to me were incomprehensible. A few days afterwards, one of my servants complained of some of his garments having been stolen. I went to Medelek, and requested that his thief-finder might exercise his office in the matter. He willingly consented.

"Levasha came to my tent, bringing with him a young Galla boy. After ceremonious compliments he questioned the robbed servant. Then he called for a small vessel of milk and a nargilleh—a water-smoking pipe. He seated himself with me on a carpet in front of my tent, all my servants being ranged before him, placing the boy between him and the complainant. He then took from his pouch two little powders, mixed them in the milk, bade the boy drink some, and poured the rest into the water-receptacle of the nargilleh; he then bade the boy smoke at this; he took a few whiffs, while, at Levasha's orders, the robbed servant held the boy's head between his hands. Then Levasha got the robbed man to take off his girdle, and held one end of it while he bound the other end to the trembling boy's hand; the boy sank to the ground with closed eyes, breathing heavily. Presently he got up, and Levasha told the man to gently draw him to the tent from whence the garments were stolen. There, the boy went directly to the spot where the man slept, acted as if taking up something, stealthily came out, went to a hollow about a hundred paces off, and seemed to hide something; then returned to us, and laid down; presently he rose and went through the motions of bread-making; from which Levasha inferred that the thief was one of the female servants, as it is they who make bread. Then he went back to the hollow and acted as if taking something up, and from thence to one of the huts in front of my tent. Returning to us he darted at one of the female servants, and gave her some slaps on the neck; then he fell as if in a swoon. The startled woman's confession confirmed the boy's vision as denoted by his acting. He slept for a couple of hours, and on waking said he remembered nothing from the time of drinking Levasha's potion.

"Medelek was delighted with the result. He told me that, to prove the faculty, he once hid a valuable, and that Levasha and the boy discovered the place where he had concealed it, the boy giving him, when he found it, similar slaps. He further said that they once tracked a man for three days who had stolen a mule, and found him with the animal.

"So it seems," concludes Anton Stecker, "that even on the 'dark continent' the 'mind-reading enigma' is not unknown."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

OUR friend Christian Reimers continues his activity in Spiritualism. In Adelaide he presides over and reports séances. He has also written a pamphlet for circulation among Germans, demonstrating remorselessly the Archduke John of Austria's false logic in his published comments upon his single séance with the medium Harry Bastian, to be present at which he shows him to have been unfitted or unprepared.—Harbinger of Light.

ABSTINENCE FROM SOLID FOOD.—The Revue Spirite quotes from the Bien Public (Mortagne), March 8th:—Last year we recorded the fact of a teacher at St. Jean la Forêt having lain five months without solid food; and then, after resuming her previous diet for a fortnight, returned to her duties. We have now to report that, after continuing in fair health for another fortnight, she again fell into a similar condition, the exciting cause having been some disturbance of her nervous system. She lies passive, breathing almost imperceptibly, with a pleasant expression of the countenance and occasional tremulous movement of the eyelids. Nothing can be taken by her beyond small sips of broth, milk, or wine and water, and these with difficulty. The course of her present attack is being watched and compared with the previous. We shall report the result.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Mr. Eglinton writes from Vienna in high spirits. Some of the strongest opponents of Spiritualism, belonging to the Imperial Court Circle, have freely admitted the reality of the manifestations, and he is hoping for equal success in other European capitals. I sincerely congratulate Mr. Eglinton on this triumphant success, which places him very distinctly at the head of European mediums—at the head of the instruments selected by the spirit-world to assure the materialism of the age that there is such a thing as Spiritualism—that it is a living, demonstrated fact.

On his return to England Mr. Eglinton hopes to make arrangements to publish his biography, which will, of course, give a full and authentic account of the manifestations at Vienna, and other European capitals, not forgetting his experiences with the late Professor Zöllner of Leipzig. All that is wanted for the completion and publication of this unique biography is a subscription list for 500 copies, to guarantee the printer's bill. Surely that should be forthcoming.

Faith in a spiritual existence after the decay of the material body has been instinctive in the highest order of minds from the remotest periods. It seems probable that this natural belief has been confirmed from time to time by sensible manifestations of spirit-life and power. It may be that the inhabitants of the higher spheres of life do not like to be ignored by those of the lower. Men carry their dispositions with them, and even, to some extent, their habits. No sudden change of thought and feeling is probable. Our friends who come to us are therefore easily identified. Our spirit-friends may grow to be angelic, but they are human all the same.

The Outlook of Spiritualism was never so encouraging. Even the wars and rumours of wars which engage the minds of thoughtful men, and fill our darkened streets with the clamour of vagabond newsmen roaring "horrible slaughter," turn the minds of men to other world realities. Every sudden death fixes the eyes of a group of relatives and friends upon the conditions of the life to come, and strikes a deathblow in some minds to our old theologies.

In this wise we may believe in some unhappy scapegrace being predestined from all eternity, to be speared by a dusky Arab in an African desert, at his country's call; but as we get better acquainted with the realities of spirit-life we become more reluctant to believe that God has fore-ordained the torments of a hotter Soudan as the inevitable destiny of any of His children to all eternity.

It is quite true that Spiritualism is modifying theology. When the reality of continued existence is demonstrated in the persons of those we have known and loved, we recognise the necessity that the conditions of the spirit-world must conform to the characters and requirements of its inhabitants. There must be fitting place and conditions for every kind, grade, and development. Show me an animal and I know its conditions. It is suited to its world. The spirit-world must correspond in every way to the character of its inhabitants. Swedenborg was either a remarkable medium or a great philosopher. Possibly both.

In any case, there is no reason to doubt that the future condition of every one will be just what his nature and actions—his character and culture—make it. So far as we know, this is our primary school, and we shall find our proper places in the higher grades upon which we must soon enter. Whether we are destined to a repetition of earthly experiences need not concern us. If re-incarnation be a fact, it has its object. The Australian savage expects to "jump up white man." "Upward," "Onward," "Excelsior," are the mottoes of humanity.

The Pall Mall Gazette, of late the most spirited of newspapers, is also the most spiritual. It finds the cause of the dauntless courage, the utter devotion of the followers of the Mahdi, in their earnest belief in immortality. They have no fear of death—they eagerly seek it as the passport to eternal joys. There is the same faith, producing the same courage, in China and Japan. In fact, an instinctive, or somehow acquired belief in a future existence, seems to belong to all primitive races.

Whether the so-called pagans who believe in immortality have had proofs of the reality of continuous existence, or have inherited the belief from those who, in some former age, had such proofs, may be uncertain; but the assertion that any people came to such a belief—as universal, for example, as in China or Japan—is probably unsusceptible of proof. The Chinese of the present day, however, are said to have independent psychography; but the whole matter of spirit manifestations in the East—China, Thibet, Japan, India, deserves thorough investigation.

The service which Mr. Gladstone has done to the cause of Spiritualism, and also of open-mindedness, and a philosophic spirit of investigation has been of great service to the truth all over the world, in so far as it has caused men to think. No doubt it has induced thousands to read and hundreds to examine. Position brings responsibility as well as power, and open-mindedness is in a fair way to become a fashionable accomplishment. One result is an index to many. The Weekly Register, said to be the special organ of His Eminence, Cardinal Manning, gives more than a column to "The Premier and the Spiritualists."

Irish ghosts are said to be as pertinacious as the Home Rulers—and in one case, going the rounds, they seem to have ruled one home until they ruined it. It was the case of an ancient house on Stephen's Green, Dublin, at one time the residence of the gay and beautiful Lady Clara. After being long empty it was taken by some ladies for a school. It was quiet except on certain nights of the week, when the doors were shut and opened; numerous footsteps heard, with the unmistakable sound of high-heeled shoes on the floor, and the rustle of silken trains, and all the noise of the arrival of a numerous company of well-dressed guests. Nothing was ever seen, though people watched constantly. The ladies had to decamp, and a gentleman, who laughed at the idea of ghosts, took it, but he laughed too soon, for the nocturnal uproar became so unbearable that he, too, had to depart. The house was then taken by some nuns, who doubtless thought that their presence would soon quell the unholy tumult. But they were mistaken; the gay company still held high revel on their accustomed nights, till, as a last resource, the house was pulled down, and the Loretto Chapel stands in its place. This is a good case for the ghost department of the Psychical Research Society.

But in what respect does an old-fashioned ghost differ from a materialised spirit? I—moi qui parle—have seen materialised spirits eat, drink, write, make, and unmake, what seemed textile fabrics to sight and touch—grow themselves from apparent nothingness and dissolve into it again. These ghosts are as solid and strong as any living man or woman, and possess the same organs, and perform many of the same functions. I have felt their muscles, and experienced the force they exercise. When a materialised spirit walks and talks he must have bones, muscles, lungs, tongue, and all the usual organs of speech. For example, the materialised spirit who calls himself "Joey"—Mr. Eglinton's friend—has good jaws and teeth, for I have seen and heard him bite off a slate pencil, a feat which the shadowy conventional ghost might find difficult.

A gentleman of St. Louis, U.S.A., gives, in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, an account of slate-writing in the light in which persons not only hear the writing but see the words as they are written—so that the progressive production of a long message could be witnessed by all present. He says: "I have often seen the medium take the slate and stand by a light, only holding it by the tips of his fingers while some one else held the other side, and long messages would come there in full view." Progress here, as elsewhere, which makes the idea of a long stay in this world the more interesting!

Materialism is said to increase the proportion of suicides.

Among Spiritualists in Europe and America suicide is extremely rare—perhaps because some spirits have given a bad account of those who have voluntarily gone to the other world before they were wanted. As a rule it seems to be best that people should live in this world as long as they can, and special honours are given to extreme old age. Juries, however, in almost every case show a tender sympathy for suicides. Felo de se is a very rare verdict.

Mrs. Hooker, the very clever sister of Rev. H. Ward Beecher, finds so many interested in her ideas of philanthropy and facts of Spiritualism, that her rooms, during her residence in Boston, have been crowded day after day, by persons who wished to enjoy her rare conversational gifts. "These gatherings" says the Banner of Light, "have assumed such dimensions that she has thoughts of taking rooms where she may hold frequent conversations, similar to those once sustained by Margaret Fuller." And a good thing to do by other gifted ladies, who might easily make their weekly At Homes useful as well as agreeable.

Mehemet Tewfik, the Mahomedan Khedive of Egypt, by the grace of Mr. Gladstone, has written a very nice letter to the sister of General Gordon, in which he says: "The whole world resounds with the name of the Englishman whose chivalrous nature afforded it for many years its brightest and most powerful example—an example which, I believe, will influence thousands of persons for good through all time. To a man of General Gordon's character the disappointment of hopes he deemed so near fruition, and the sudden manner of his death, were of little importance. In his own words, he left 'weariness for perfect peace.' Our mourning for him is very true and real, as is our loss; but we have a sure hope that a life and faith such as Gordon's are not extinguishable by what we call death." Now, I do not see that a good Christian, or even a Spiritualist, could have done better, but General Gordon said that he was himself a good Mahomedan.

The Northern Daily Express, Newcastle, gives a friendly and appreciative notice of the "Psychical Marvels" communicated to "LIGHT" by Mr. Barkas, in which it says: "The first and second papers have appeared, and if the remainder are no less wonderful than those already published, they are likely to excite great interest in the minds of physicists and psychologists."

It is on the cards that before many years are over every popular newspaper will have its department of psychology, filled with interesting facts and curious speculations.

For a good beginning, Word and Work, a popular religious periodical of March 12th, opens with an article on "The Occult World," which is followed by one on "A Novel Spiritualism," while the third article is on "Modern Miracles"; certainly the ice is broken. It does not matter that the writers tell us it is all of the devil who is at his old work of deceiving men, by offering men hidden knowledge and saying, "Ye shall be as gods."

Then we have the process of the manufacture of a new Buddha by the old one taking possession of an infant four months old, so effectively described by an uncertain "Mr. K." in "Isis Unveiled." The modern "miracles" are the Faith Cures of Major Pierson of the Salvation Army—which, whatever they may be, should certainly be carefully examined, instead of being ignorantly denounced—because if people can be deceived as to miracles of healing, how are we to be sure that the blind were made to see, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, devils cast out, and the dead raised to life at any time anywhere?

Assuredly the last person to denounce miracles should be one who is trying to induce men to believe in a book full of them. We expect materialists to deny spiritual manifestations as impossible while refusing to ascertain whether they may not be true; but the man who asks us to believe a host of miracles which were wrought two or three thousand years ago must not tell us that they are impossible to-day or to-morrow.

And the day has dawned when Mrs. Oliphant, a first-class novelist, begins a supernatural story, entitled "The Seen and the Unseen" in Blackwood's Magazine:—which is reviewed with a supernatural extract, in the Literary World! Such is the present outlook.

There are subjects not open to comitreatment—the prayers of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for example, or Mr. Gladstone investigating Spiritualism. They are quite outside the province of a comic paper. An honest man seeking proofs of immortality is high above all the din of Fleet-street. In any case Punch is not up to it, and had better leave it to his agnostic and atheistic neighbours.

Mr. Bradlaugh, leader of the materialistic and, of course, atheistic wing of the Secular party, has been compelled to issue a new pronunciamento against Spiritualism. Feeling and thought being results of cerebral development, must cease with the paralysis or disintegration of the brain, all the phenomena in the world to the contrary notwithstanding. Talk about Papal infallibility!

MAGNETIC HEALING.—Herr V. Zimmermann, councillor of Chemnitz, Germany, has bequeathed to the municipality half a million of marks, on condition that it authorises the foundation of a professorship, with clinical school attached, of the theory and practise of magnetic therapeutics, or treatment of disease by the natural or magnetic method.—Le Spiritisme.

MADAME BABLIN.—In a private family at Brussels, at a séance, the usual phenomena were witnessed with this medium. She called upon them next day, and while seated with them in their garden, described five spirits, with their individual traits, all of whom were recognised. At the next séance, among other phenomena, a hand was laid upon that of one of the sitters next the medium; he sceptically asked himself—could the hand be one of hers? As if his thought had been spoken the hand raised his and laid it upon those of the medium joined together in her lap.—La Lumière.

GEORGE CHAINEY.—A correspondent in the Harbinger of Light, Robert White, says:—"After lecturing eight years on secular platforms, with no belief in anything beyond this world, George Chainey became convinced, through Spiritualism, that this life is continued into a spiritual state in which there is continual progression. Such conviction is incompatible with Atheism. It will become to him a rational religion. I myself once stood upon the same platform. I was a Materialist. When through spiritual phenomena, I learnt that there is no death, my Atheism went. The more I know of the phenomena of Spiritualism, and learn of its teachings, the more religious I feel myself to be, the more I adore God in Whom we all 'live and move and have our being.' The science of Spiritualism satisfies the intellect, and its religion the heart."

THE MAGNETISER, M. DONATO.—In 1875 there was on the staff of the Brussels Chronicle, an honest, sceptical gentleman named D'Hondt, who used to attend the meetings of the Union Spirite and argue against the possibility of psychic action. He was induced by a friend to investigate the facts of moving tables, and then of animal magnetism. He found that tables moved by some force, not muscular, proceeding from himself, and that he could induce, apparently by the same force, the magnetic coma. Such, ten years ago, was the commencement of the career of M. Donato, by which name M. d'Hondt chose to introduce himself to audiences as a magnetiser. He is portly, has a sympathetic tenor voice, and bright sparkling eyes. He is now giving his astonishing demonstrations in magnetism to compact crowds in the Théâtre du Gymnase, Liège.—Le Messager.

NEW ZEALAND.—A correspondent of the Harbinger of Light writes: "In Greytown there are now mediums for various phenomena. When the manifestations took place in Mr. Nation's family, a year and a-half ago, he published the fact in his own newspaper. They first came through the mediumship of one of his daughters, thirteen years old. While a visitor would watch the writing through her hand, it was sometimes written, 'Let the visitor try'; and in many cases he was convinced through his own hand: so the movement spread. But it is opposed equally by clergy and secularists. In a lecture recently by one of these he ventured the explanation that a table became charged with the magnetism of the sitters, and communications were reflections of their minds; he had experimented himself, but the result to him had been lies. A Spiritualist in the audience asked if he was sure the table was fully charged with his own magnetism? At which there was some laughter."

The Resurrection Body.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Some months ago I read with deep interest Mr. Haughton's able letter recorded in "LIGHT" on the Bishop of Carlisle's "Theory of Apparitions," which also appeared in your journal, and it has since given me much food for thought, the result of which at this season you may perhaps not consider out of place to allow me space for in your columns.

To all thoughtful minds the question must be a momentous one of "What became of our Lord's body? It was not found in the sepulchre nor afterwards discovered elsewhere;" and if I venture to suggest a possible solution of this difficulty, I trust I shall not be charged with presumption.

We know that the human body can be resolved into its primitive and invisible elements, for I think I am right in stating that the great chemist Liebig absolutely accomplished this feat in the presence of a number of his pupils, whom he had purposely assembled to witness it; and so thoroughly was it accomplished that of the human body laid out before them not one particle finally remained visible; the whole being volatilised into its original elements and gases, and, mingling with the atmosphere, became, like it, invisible!

Now, such a fact having been demonstrated to be possible by an earthly chemist, does it require an impossible stretch of the imagination—to Spiritualists at all events—to suppose that as much at least could be done by a spirit operator, to whom the analysis of the human body would be as an open book before him; or that those spiritual beings who, under the Divine command, watched over and guarded our Lord's tomb, would have any difficulty in separating and disintegrating the elements composing the body; which thus liberated would, as a natural consequence, return to their primitive invisible state?

That the form our Lord subsequently appeared in was not that laid in the tomb, we have clear evidence of; as those who had best known Him before His crucifixion did not recognise Him—not because that body was so spiritualised as to be beyond recognition, or He would not have been thought to have been a person less spiritual than Himself when living—viz.: the gardener; but either that He purposely assumed another form, or that the atmosphere did not, at the moment, yield the exact elements needful to the perfect restoration of His previous bodily appearance, and which, from the New Testament records, we may assume it subsequently did.

That this resurrection body was only a transient one there also seems ample deductory evidence (as Mr. Haughton has so ably shown), specially from our Lord's suddenly appearing and disappearing in the midst of His followers when the doors were shut.

As Spiritualists, we have no difficulties on this head (quite independently of our Lord's exceptional powers), having personal knowledge of the continual recurrence of this phenomenon at the present day.

Then, as we know that spiritual beings of this day of an ordinary type, can and do clothe themselves with a body as material for the time being to the sight, and to the touch, and to every sense, as complete as are our own bodies, and can and do afterwards dissolve that body into nothingness before our very eyes, surely we may well believe that He—God's well-beloved Son—could do so likewise!

And herein we have such an immense advantage over those who, not having investigated, cannot realise the marvellous powers possessed by the spirit world, and which they are allowed in this our day to demonstrate to their fellow beings in the flesh, for the purpose of carrying out the great and gracious designs of the Almighty—once more through His well-beloved Son their Leader—for the regeneration of our race; a work begun by Him not merely two thousand years ago, as is generally received, but from all time as time commences for us.

I feel painfully my inability to adequately express my thoughts on this momentous subject, but having given a dim outline of them, perhaps a more able penman amongst your readers may take up the subject, and elucidate it more fully.—I beg to remain, sir, faithfully yours,

March 19th, 1885.

"LILY."

Testimony to Mr. Eglington's Power.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I think I ought to let your readers judge for me as to whether I am right or not in accepting without question "slate-writing" as done in Mr. Eglington's presence. I have been at eight séances with Mr. Eglington—one in public, the others in private with one other person and myself. At two out of the seven private ones absolutely nothing occurred. At one other only the word "No" was written to my verbal question as to whether "they" would write. The "No" was very feebly written, but I felt and heard the pencil moving about inside the slates on the table under my hands. At the four remaining séances I had ample writing. At three of the séances I had replies given to questions which no human eye had seen. I had writing in the hand of a deceased relative. I had slate after slate written on, held in the air between Mr. Eglington and myself, and while I was watching the slates, I had a slateful written in this way in a few seconds. I had writing and replies to private questions on the locked slate, with my hand on the top of it while the writing was going on inside. I had writing on new slates, never cleaned. At one séance I had thirteen or fourteen different slates with different writings. One piece of information was not true. I was told, "There is someone here who knew you in —," a place I have never visited. All the private séances took place in the day and in full light. I was in full possession of my senses. I have seven or eight slates by me to prove that the phenomena really occurred. I can offer no explanation, but only state facts. Am I, after evidence like this, to say I do not believe? I cannot. I have given slate-writing a fair and ample trial, and it is a wonder of wonders, and worthy of the deepest and truest investigation.—I am, sir, Absurd Trade Prejudice.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is difficult to realise the reality of the following absurd trade prejudice. I order of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son yearly upwards of £200 worth of papers and periodicals, for which I pay full retail price. A few days ago I requested one copy of "LIGHT" to be added to the weekly parcel, and received in reply "We do not supply this paper." As the journals I now obtain range from Agnosticism to Roman Catholicism I should like to know from you why Messrs. Smith and Son do not supply your paper. Is it because you will not supply them? Is the paper too sensible and orthodox, or what is the reason?—I am, &c.,

March 13th, 1885.

T. P. BARKAS.

[This is not the first time a complaint of the kind has reached us. It is, however, impossible to get redress or explanation of any kind from Messrs. Smith and Son. Mr. White, the manager, at a personal interview absolutely refused to supply "LIGHT" to the order of their customers—a different thing from keeping the paper on sale, a course we could not expect—or to give any reason for his action.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

A DEPOT for the sale of spiritualist books has been opened by Katsan Brothers, in Popham's Broadway, Madras.

MAGNETIC HEALING.—The basis of magnetic or mesmeric healing is an imponderable aura given off by the nervous system; its potency is increased and directed by the will of the operator, sometimes with the co-operation of a spirit: this imponderable, called human or vital magnetism, is received and assimilated by the nervous system of patients, as is proved by their reaction to it, into sense and health.

PSYCHOMETRY AND OCCULT SCIENCE.—Dr. J. Commodore Street, of Boston, who has just arrived in London, writes from 16, York-street, Portman-square, W., to say that, having received instructions from Dr. J. Rhodes Buchanan, he is prepared to give lessons in psychometry, as taught by Dr. Buchanan himself. He has also been a student, under the Japanese Occultist, Yoe Lang Poonetiqua, of the power of mind over matter, and is ready to impart his knowledge to earnest inquirers. He would also like, if suitable members can be found, to form a "Delphic Circle" after the manner of the Greek Oracle. Communications may be sent to him at the above address.

TRACES OF SPIRITUALISM IN RECENT WORKS.

By "M. A. (OXON)."

GEORGE ELIOT'S LETTERS.

George Eliot, as appears from the letters recently published by her husband, had no liking for what the world knows as Spiritualism. Mrs. Beecher Stowe, a Spiritualist, as her husband also was, brought the subject under her notice with some want of tact, and the result was not satisfactory. George Eliot's was not the type of mind to be impressed with the external aspects of Spiritualism, though it must be said that she is too severely critical of them. They were indeed repulsive to her, as her answers to Mrs. Stowe's letters prove. These letters are, perhaps, worth preserving, and I append them.

Letter to Mrs. Stowe. 1.

Both Mr. Lewes and I are deeply interested in the indications which the Professor gives of his peculiar psychological experience, and we should feel it a great privilege to learn much more of it from his lips. It is a rare thing to have such an opportunity of studying exceptional experience in the testimony of a truthful and in every way distinguished mind. He will, I am sure, accept the brief thanks which I can give in this letter for all that he has generously written to me. He says: "I have had no connection with any of the modern movements, except as father confessor"; and I can well believe that he must be peculiarly sensitive to the repulsive aspects which those movements present. Your view as to the cause of that "great wave of Spiritualism" which is rushing over America—namely, that it is a sort of Rachel-cry of bereavement towards the invisible existence of the loved ones—is deeply affecting. But, so far as Spiritualism" (by which I mean, of course, spirit communication, by rapping, guidance of the pencil, &c.) has come within reach of my judgment on our side of the water, it has appeared to me either as degrading folly, imbecile in the estimate of evidence, or else as impudent imposture. So far as my observation and experience have hitherto gone, it has even seemed to me an impiety to withdraw from the more assured methods of studying the open secret of the universe any large amount of attention to alleged manifestations which are so defiled by low adventurers and their palpable trickeries, so hopelessly involved in all the doubtfulness of individual testimonies as to phenomena witnessed, which testimonies are no more true objectively because they are honest subjectively than the Ptolemaic system is true because it seemed to Tycho Brahe a better explanation of the heavenly movements than the Copernican. This is a brief statement of my position on the subject, which your letter shows me to have an aspect much more compulsory on serious attention in America than I can perceive it to have in England. I should not be as simply truthful as my deep respect for you demands if I did not tell you exactly what is my mental attitude in relation to the phenomena in question. But whatever you print on the subject, and will send me, I shall read with attention; and the idea you give me of the hold which Spiritualism has gained on the public mind in the United States is already a fact of historic importance.*

Letter to Mrs. Stowe. 2.

When I am more at liberty, I will certainly read Mr. [Dale] Owen's books, if he is good enough to send them to me. I desire on all subjects to keep an open mind, but hitherto the various phenomena reported or attested in connection with ideas of spirit-intercourse, have come before me here in the painful form of the lowest charlatanism. Take Mr. H. as an example of what I mean. I could not choose to enter a room where he held a séance. He is an object of moral disgust to me; and nothing of late reported by Mr. Crookes, Lord Lindsay, and the rest, carries conviction to my mind that Mr. H. is not simply an impostor, whose professedly abnormal manifestations have varied their fashion in order to create a new market, just as if they were papier mâché wares or pomades for the idle rich. But apart from personal contact with people who get money by public exhibitions as mediums, or with semi-idiot, such as those who make a court for a Mrs. Guppy or other feminine personage of that kind, I would not willingly place any barriers between my mind and any possible channel of truth affecting the human lot.†

The spirit in which you have written in the paper you kindly sent me, is likely to teach others, to rouse them at least to attention in a case where you have been deeply impressed.‡

Letter to Mrs. Stowe. 3.

I was much impressed with the fact—which you had told me—that he was the original of the "visionary boy" in "Old Town Folk"; and it must be deeply interesting to talk with him on his experience.

Perhaps I am inclined, under the influence of the facts physiological and psychological, which have been gathered of late years, to give larger place to the interpretation of vision—seeing as subjective than the Professor would approve. It seems difficult to limit—at least to limit with any precision—the possibility of confounding sense by impressions, derived from inward conditions, with those which are directly dependent on external stimulus. In fact, the division between within and without in this sense seems to become every year a more subtle and bewildering problem.

Your experience with the planchette is amazing; but that the words which you found it to have written were dictated by the spirit of Charlotte Brontë is to me (whether rightly or not) so enormously improbable, that I could only accept it if every condition were laid bare, and every explanation demonstrated to be impossible. If it were another spirit aping Charlotte Brontë—if here and there at rare spots, and among people of a certain temperament, or even at many spots and among people of all temperaments, tricky spirits are liable to rise as a sort of earth-bubbles, and set furniture in movement, and tell things which we either know already or should be as well without knowing—I must frankly confess that I have but a feeble interest in these doings, feeling my life very short for the supreme and awful revelations of a more orderly and intelligible kind which I shall die with an imperfect knowledge of. If there were miserable spirits whom we could help, then I think we should pause and have patience with their trivial-mindedness; but otherwise I don't feel bound to study them more than I am bound to study the special follies of a particular phase of human society. Others, who feel differently, and are attracted towards this study, are making an experiment for us as to whether anything better than bewilderment can come of it. At present it seems to me that to rest any fundamental part of religion on such a basis is a melancholy misguidance of men's minds from the true sources of high and pure emotion.

* George Eliot's Life, p. 92.

† It does not appear that George Eliot had any reason for this vituperative utterance beyond a mere dislike which depended on impulse, and not at all on the exercise of her reason.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

V.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

I am comforted to think that you partly agree with me there.*

This is the not unreasonable attitude of a mind like George Eliot's to what presented itself to her in her very slender knowledge of the subject—if knowledge it can properly be called at all—as crude, vulgar, and repellent when it was what it pretended to be, and doubly repulsive when, as too often seemed to be the case, the alleged spiritualistic phenomena were but counterfeit imitations of the true. Hers was a deeply introspective mind; one that concerned itself with the niceties of philosophical abstractions, rather than with the external presentation of curious phenomena, which the nearest conjurer would show more neatly, and which she would not care to differentiate from the genuine phenomena of mediumship.

Yet she was not altogether unamenable to spirit-power. No one can read her letters, written in the abandonment of perfect confidence, to her intimate friends, without drawing a marked contrast between George Eliot the woman and George Eliot the authoress. As a woman her letters show her commonplace and dull. There is not in the three large volumes that contain her letters one that rises above the commonplace, until one correspondent touches her heart and causes her to reveal the secrets of its religious changes. From Puritan she had passed through various phases of belief, through a vague Agnosticism to what must be described, for want of a better term, as Positivism.

In the history of those religious changes we seem to trace the influence of something beyond and outside of the woman; something that lifts her above the humdrum monotony of her ordinary correspondence, and touches her soul with fire.

But it is not until we come to the authoress that we discern the full difference between George Eliot and Marian Evans. When she comes to pen "Adam Bede" she is veritably inspired. She lives in the scenes that she is creating. She is wrapped up in the characters whose lineaments she traces. She is as far removed from her ordinary self as light is from darkness. And why? Her imagination, that Divine creative faculty, has been aroused, and for the time she is a new woman. There her Spiritualism is shown. There is the place where Mrs. Stowe might have appealed to her on the ground of philosophical and religious Spiritualism, for she would have claimed part and lot in it, and would have needed no external demonstration of its innate truth, of its infinite possibilities. There she had ears to hear. Mrs. Stowe approached her where she was stone deaf.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Again, through an enormous press of work, we are far behind with our correspondence. We intended to make a clean sweep of it all, and start afresh, by answering it briefly in these columns, but, however good the intention, we have utterly failed to accomplish it. A few replies, however, will be found in another column, and we ask any reader of "LIGHT" or private correspondent to whom we owe a letter to look down the page and see whether the answer appears there. We shall try and complete the task next week. It is from no want of courtesy that we adopt this method of clearing off arrears; it is simply the sheer impossibility of keeping pace with the many demands upon us. These remarks apply to all who have addressed letters either to the Editor of "LIGHT," the Manager of the Psychological Press, or Mr. J. S. Farmer personally.

POETRY, like truth, is a common flower. God has sown it over the earth like the daisies, sprinkled with tears, and glowing in the sun; even as He places the crocus and the March frosts together, and beautifully mingles life and death.

* George Eliot's Life, p. 160.

Let us compare the various facts and theories before quoted, with the results of our personal observations, and try to arrive at some more definite conclusion. In the first place let it be premised (1) that matter, as we know it, is but a phase of spirit; or, in other words, that certain substances, which (because of their invisibility) are termed spiritual, are but refined phases of matter; (2) that as we find degrees of substantiality in what to our cognisance is matter, so there are also degrees of attenuation in what, for want of a better term, we will call spirit-substance. It seems also that the spirit-substance that comes into operation at séances, is (like the majority of spirit manifestations we are able to witness) of the crudest kind, and belongs to that degree or phase which is nearest to the most refined phases of this earthly matter. In the presence of the physical medium the two worlds, spiritual and material, may be said to meet. To illustrate our proposition, let us see in what order we are to arrange a series of transitions from the palpable and visible to the spiritual or invisible, and confine ourselves exclusively to the "drapery" now under discussion. First of all we have the permanent, time-resisting, and somewhat massive material of calico-like texture; samples or specimens of which, have been given to us by the materialised "spirits." (2) Somewhat similar drapery, but in a condition resembling gauze or gossamer (I have witnessed the formation of the second out of the first, and will refer to this on a future occasion). (3) The condition in which it is seen during the latter stages of its production, when it is sufficiently solid to fold or fall in pleats, but still liable to be stretched, diffused, and again amalgamated with other masses in process of formation. (4) As it appears in thick clouds, slowly contracting into a sheet, or strip, or definable quantity; a stage in which the indication of broad folds is already visible, and which, as a mass, will cast a shadow. (5) The stage when the cloud is opaque, ill-defined, and amorphous. (6) When it appears as a thin, transparent, whitish, nebulousity. (7) When seen, (which is possible in total darkness only), as a faintly luminous mist. Here our power of observation ends, and it might be supposed that no further attenuation can be imagined or be possible. So it would seem; but "photography sees what man's mortal eyes do not perceive, and depicts a still further stage of what is still materiality." Even in these mysterious products, degree of materiality is apparent. We have also to consider how far the "veridical phantom" or the equally abstruse "visible astral-body" may be material; for, if there are demonstrable gradations from the material to the spiritual, these must unavoidably find their place amongst some class or other. It cannot be denied that photography reproduces them. When the portraits so obtained are faithful likenesses of the departed, when they are recognised as friends or relatives, whose presence, as spirits, was not even anticipated nor, perhaps, wished for, and when it is known that many of the so recognised "spirits" had, in their earthly existence, never been portrayed, there is no ground for further doubt or unbelief. Hence, we find in these reproductions a most conclusive proof that there is an after-life, and that spiritual beings, in their actual condition, either possess, or can assume, temporarily, an appearance in so far objective as to reflect the actinic rays on the sensitised photographic plate. Any other attempt to account for the facts would be as unreasonable as it would be unwise and ungrateful, for a discovery of such tremendous significance should be accepted as a precious testimonial to the reality of man's most cherished belief. To reason away such glorious facts would be equal to rejecting evidence in support of one's own case before a court of law.

As will be noticed in these mysterious productions, the "spirits" appear in loose drapery, arranged after the same fashion as is adopted by the corporealised apparitions that are evolved in the presence of physical mediums.

I have examined nearly 100 of these photographs, and find the drapery to be of different degrees of substantiality. What must be considered a very remarkable feature is, that in most cases where the drapery is thin and vaporous, there is not only a larger quantity than would be necessary to cover the whole body, but part of the flowing substance is placed in direct contact with the person near whom the "spirit" appears. Either, part of it touches his shoulder, head or knees, or sometimes the "sitter" is partly enveloped in the vaporous mass that hides the remaining portion of the "spirit" (if the remaining portion does actually exist). The deduction to be made from this fact would be that, to make the substance objective, contact with the human "magnetism" (by which is meant a certain efflux or surrounding aura of a hitherto ill-defined nature) is pre-requisite, in the same manner as the magnetism of a physical medium is a sine qua non for the production of the drapery and the "forms" observed in the séance-room. Now, the drapery reproduced in these photographs presents the very same features, both in development and in its finished state, as we notice in the garments worn by the materialised "forms." There are likewise distinct marks of hemmed edges, sometimes indications of embroidery, and, not unfrequently, figures or dots peculiar to printed cotton stuff. Unfortunately, these photographs, being on paper, do not allow any considerable magnification without, at the same time, causing a confusion between the impression and the substance of the paper itself. It must be left to those possessing an original negative to try the experiment under a powerful microscope to detect (1) whether the apparently more solid drapery is also really woven, and (2) how far the vaporous flowing substance shows an indication of the intercrossings of threads. Perhaps from these photographs we might learn—concerning formation of drapery—what séance-room phenomena withhold from us. However, we may reasonably infer that where material is hemmed, or where embroidery, or dots and figures are present, it must also be woven, because no such particular care or fanciful improvement could have been bestowed upon the garments were its nature different. At all events the substance, whether woven or not, would still be earthly in its origin, no matter in what condition we see it, and whether it be composed of threads, flakes, plush, or any other natural product. But now a further question presents itself, viz.: Is the representation (of this spirit-drapery) as obtained by photography that of the much discussed "spiritual counterpart"? i.e., the "essential basis" of which solid drapery is produced in the séance-room; or, does the photographic reproduction represent a substance made for the occasion, and to which there exists still another preëxistent source or fundament? It seems there must be, because in these photographs a degree of substantiality is noticeable. Then, the cloudy flowing masses are more voluminous than would be requisite to cover a "form," which would suggest the probability of a subsequent contraction of the substance. Also, the almost invariable contact of these vaporous masses with the vital element, human magnetism, or the human body, seems to denote the indispensability of some such vehicle to obtain the desired accretion or solidification. With these important data before us, it is obvious that the drapery, as reproduced in these photographs, must be equally derived from a still anterior source or a still more refined phase of matter. Besides, the highly significant fact that these "spirit-faces," the hands and sometimes other characteristics, or even malformations, are, without exception, like what they used to be in earth-life (a baby returns as a baby after a lapse of thirty or more years) and must be regarded as conclusive evidence that these "spirits" so reproduced, do not exhibit themselves as they would be "naturally" in their present state of existence, but appear as a self-constructed temporary "double" of what they were when mortals. If they are to approach us, with intent to be photographed and recognised, no other course is conceivable; unless it be assumed that babies remain babies into eternity, and that no further progress towards higher spiritual conditions awaits humanity in the future. It is far more probable then, that the human form, like the garments covering it, is re-assumed, perhaps unconsciously, by entering into direct relation with earthly surroundings, or by volition, and for the occasion only. Now, if there is a re-assumption of the objective appearance, that objectivity must have been produced out of—or derived from—some substance or other. Whether that material addition be ever so refined matters little; it must needs come from somewhere.

ON CONJURERS' IMITATIONS.

The Messenger makes allusion to the estimable Mr. John Fowler, a merchant of Liverpool, who departed this life last November, and quotes his letter to the Liverpool Daily Post, January 30th, 1883 which the Messenger reproduced at the time. In that letter, Mr. Fowler related some of his experiences. He said: "To mental questions I have received prompt answers written on the inner side of slates laid upon each other, while held in my own hands. The answers bore the signature of a brother who died years before in Australia, and related to matters known only to him and myself. I have had pictures painted in a darkened room, I myself bringing with me the materials for such painting, and taking away with me the pictures wet. I have seen tables float free from the floor without contact of anyone. I have heard mediums speak under the influence or control of spirit-friends, by the hour together, referring to occurrences in their earthly life known to me, and also to some not known to me, but which were verified."

Mr. Fowler was at the Church Congress, held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in October, 1881. He there urged investigation into the well-attested facts of Spiritualism, some of which he adduced; but the majority of the Congress preferred to listen to a young man, under the patronage of a Bishop, who had assumed the catching name of "Stuart Cumberland." He told the Congress that the so-called facts were deceptions and illusions, as he himself could show. This protégé of the Bishop was applauded. A few days afterwards the Bishop took the chair at an advertised exhibition by this "S. C." of imitations of spiritual phenomena.

On this Mr. Fowler publicly offered a large sum to this "Stuart Cumberland," to any or every conjurer, if they could produce the same phenomena, under the same conditions as those produced in the presence of mediums. The challenge, like all other similar challenges, was not accepted.

Imagine a conjurer obtaining answers to questions in different languages, as was the case with Mr. W. Eglinton in a recent interview with Mr. Gladstone. Imagine a conjurer being called upon to repeat the experiment made by M. Victor de la Hesbaye, editor of the Chronique, with Dr. Slade, when he was at the Hotel Windsor, at Brussels, after the Lankester affair in London. The editor of the Chronique recorded on that occasion:—"Dr. Slade only, and I sat together in full light. I placed a morsel of pencil between two slates, which we held together by their frames; and, presently, I found written on the inner surface of one of them three sentences—in Dutch, English, and in French, each in a different handwriting. Dr. Slade speaks English only. He did not move his fingers. Let those explain who can."

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

Exposition of Slate Writing by Conjuring, at Ulverston.

On Monday evening week, Mr. Thomas W. Gowland, manager for Messrs. Tyler Brothers, boot and shoe dealers, of Ulverston, and who was one of Mr. Eglinton's sitters on the occasion of his recent visit to that town, gave there, before the majority of those who had sat with Mr. Eglinton during his stay, and a number of others, an exhibition of slate-writing by conjuring. Mr. Gowland after Mr. Eglinton's visit gave a certificate, which was published by us, as to Mr. Eglinton's table, in which he said, "I declare that there is no deceptive contrivance about it, and that it appears to be one of the most unlikely description to be selected by a conjurer for his purpose." Notwithstanding this certificate, the object of his exhibition was to show that the whole of the manifestations at the single séance he had attended were dependent upon a certain feature in the construction of the table. Mr. Gowland claimed that he produced his results under precisely the same conditions. He exhibited a table constructed by himself, which was pronounced by several to be identical in construction with that brought by Mr. Eglinton to Ulverston, and a circle was formed around it, Mr. Gowland and the next sitter to him joining their left hands and their arms lying across the table close to the edge. The "exposer" then invited conversation, and a pretty loud murmur of voices thereupon commenced. The operator with his right hand held a perfectly blank single slate under the table, pressing it close against the flap at first, but presently, while the audience were absorbed in loud conversation, and the motion of his right arm being hidden by the left arms of himself and his next sitter, he slipped the slate into the opening or slot which is left under the table when the bar which supports the flap is drawn out. His right hand being then free, he secretly wrote on the upper side of the slate the word "Yes," which amidst the noise of conversation he could easily do inaudibly; he then turned the slate in the slot so that, when exhibited, the word would be at the end farthest from himself, and upside down. Then, withdrawing the slate from the aperture, he again pressed it close up against the flap, his hand being once more exposed to view. In a few minutes he invited the audience to listen to the sound of writing, and immediately a sound became audible which was utterly unlike that heard at Mr. Eglinton's séances, and was really produced by the "exposer" scratching with his nail on the under surface of the slate. Then he triumphantly, amidst the applause of some, and the derision of others, exhibited the writing which he had executed some time before. He repeated the process with another single slate, writing on it the words "There is power," this being meant as an ironical allusion to the fact that at one of Mr. Eglinton's séances the sentence "There is no power" was written. The Bramah-locked slate manifestation was imitated thus. The slate used was not a locked one at all, but was simply fastened by means of a hook, with a screw for a catch. Mr. Robert Casson, auctioneer, one of Mr. Gowland's circle, secretly wrote a lengthy question in the slate, fastened it, and handed it, pencil inside, to Mr. Gowland. The "exposer" surreptitiously slipped it into the aperture beneath the table, opened it, and wrote in it, then fastened it, and held it against the under side of the flap as before, his hand in sight, and presently laid it upon the table, remarking that there was no success. After another experiment with a single slate, he lifted the closed slate from the table, and held it in the air. Instantly the sound of scratching was again heard, which he was producing with his finger nail under the slate, and on it being opened the words, "There is no light," which had been written under the table, were found within. Mr. Casson complained that this sentence was no answer to his question, and Mr. Gowland, though he had a large fire behind him to aid him in reading the questions, as he afterwards explained, stating that Mr. Eglinton always sat with his back to the fire presumably with the same object, and though he had a stronger gaslight than Mr. Eglinton had,—replied that his light was not equal to Mr. Eglinton's. Several of the audience, including the writer of this report, expressed the opinion that it was better. We may mention that in the course of the proceedings a gentleman present called out that he saw Mr. Gowland scratching, a circumstance which has certainly never occurred at a séance of Mr. Eglinton's. Mr. Gowland then gave an explanation of how his phenomena were produced. Afterwards Mr. Robert Casson was appointed chairman to preserve order, and Mr. Gowland proceeded to deliver a further address, of such duration that those who had to reply to him had not half the time he had occupied in which to make their observations. He characterised Mr. Eglinton's locked slate manifestation as rather a barefaced sort of thing, and stated that though he allowed the writer of a question in it to lock it, and retain the key, he (Mr. Eglinton) must have a duplicate key with which he opened the slate under the table. Mr. Gowland said another Ulverston gentleman had, simultaneously with himself, hit upon his idea of how slate-writing was done. If Mr. Eglinton would produce answers to questions in the dark, in which he could not read the questions, it would be much more satisfactory. He (Mr. Gowland) only undertook to expose what he saw at the séance he himself attended. He left it for others to explain the remainder. He wished it to be understood that he did not call Mr. Eglinton an impostor. He was not ignorant of the testimony given by men of science and high social position in that gentleman's favour. Mr. Gowland proceeded to comment on the fact of Mr. Eglinton bringing his own table to Ulverston as suspicious, also complained that he objected to people looking under the table when the sound as of writing was going on, and that he could not always get manifestations, alleging that this was just what would be the case with a conjurer, who would have to watch his opportunity to deceive. He also said he could not conceive how there could be more difficulty in getting writing in sealed slates than in others if it was executed by spirits. He further objected that the writing was never commenced at the top of the slate. This, he said, seemed to be due to this, that Mr. Eglinton could not reach the top because of the aperture in which the slate rested preventing him. Mr. Gowland then endeavoured to explain away his certificate by saying that it only declared the table to be apparently satisfactory, and said he had given it for a purpose—to show how people could be deceived by relying on the testimony of others. Mr. J. G. Speed, editor of the Ulverston Mirror, who was instrumental in bringing Mr. Eglinton to Ulverston, led the opposition. He denied that the conditions were the same, appealing to Mr. Eglinton's sitters to prove this, and attacked Mr. Gowland as to his certificate, declaring that it was intended to describe the table as really satisfactory, Mr. Gowland having pronounced it, in the presence of the speaker and three other persons at the house of a Mr. Martindale, to be so, and Mr. J. S. Sykes, who was present, having declared to him (Mr. Speed) that Mr. Gowland had, the morning after his séance with Mr. Eglinton, expressed his conviction that the manifestations were spiritual. Mr. Speed cited the facts that at a séance at a private house in Ulverston, where a table without any aperture beneath it was used, results were obtained, and that Mr. Eglinton at, at least, one of his other séances had, of his own accord, suggested that another table should be substituted for his own. Mr. Speed adduced the experience of the German scientists with Dr. Slade, and of Professor Cassall and others with Mr. Eglinton, in obtaining writing on blank slates, never placed under the table; also the speaker's own obtainment of writing on blank slates on Mr. Eglinton's table in London, and the opinions of conjurers in favour of Messrs. Eglinton and Slade. He concluded by describing Mr. Gowland's séance as a crude, clumsy, and utterly inadequate attempt to explain the marvellous phenomena of Mr. Eglinton. Mr. James Hamer followed. He said he had not witnessed one of Mr. Eglinton's conditions in Mr. Gowland's séance. Mr. Eglinton always grasped the top of the table with his thumb in holding the slate under the table, and kept the slate close up against the flap; but Mr. Gowland put his hand completely out of sight. Most of Mr. Eglinton's manifestations that he (Mr. Hamer) had witnessed were produced upon the table. Mr. Hamer cited some remarkable instances in which writing had been obtained in closed slates never taken off the table, and one case in which they had never been either on or under the table—when writing was obtained in the air. Mr. Hamer expressed his surprise that Mr. Gowland should think that sensible men could be gulled by such crude and clumsy tricks into thinking they were an exposure of Mr. Eglinton. Mr. J. S. Sykes, clerk to the Ulverston Board of Guardians, said he believed that Spiritualism was imposture and wicked, but expressed the conviction that Mr. Eglinton's manifestations were no jugglery, but the result of some mysterious, not yet comprehended, force of nature. Mr. H. W. Hope, lay-assistant in connection with an Ulverston Episcopal church, also bore testimony in favour of Mr. Eglinton, declaring that he had obtained, in the air, between two slates, which he could swear were blank when put together, an audible answer to an oral question put while he and Mr. Eglinton held the slates. Mr. A. H. Sykes, solicitor, and others, also deposed to marvellous experiences with Mr. Eglinton; and, though two gentlemen supported Mr. Gowland, the majority of those present, at any rate of those who had sat with Mr. Eglinton, were of opinion that Mr. Gowland's séance was a signal and ludicrous failure to account for Mr. Eglinton's phenomena. Mr. Gowland replied on the discussion, and declared that Mr. Speed's assertion that he (Mr. Gowland) had, at Mr. Martindale's house, said the construction of the table had nothing to do with the manifestations, was untrue; and further, that he had never met Mr. Martindale or mentioned the subject to him. Mr. Martindale asserted that Mr. Speed's statement was true. A withdrawal of Mr. Gowland's denial that he met Mr. Martindale has since been published, Mr. Gowland declaring that he had forgotten the circumstance, but he still maintains that he never made the assertion about the table. We can confidently assert that Mr. Gowland's séance was a complete exposure, but merely because of his own incapacity to produce even the least of Mr. Eglinton's marvels under the same conditions.

[We have also received other communication on this subject—one from Mr. Gowland—with which we will deal next week, making also a few remarks on the question ourselves.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

GLASGOW.—On Monday, 23rd ult., Mr. Morse again occupied the platform of the Spiritualists while his guides discoursed on the subject: "Man, why was he made?" The basic idea conveyed was that man within himself contained the only satisfactory answer that could be obtained, and that answer, endorsed by Spiritualism, was complete and conclusive. A theme so interesting and philosophical afforded an opportunity for the display of that masterly grasp and rich fluency and grandeur of expression which are peculiarly characteristic of the guides of Mr. Morse. It being probably the last public appearance of Mr. Morse in Glasgow prior to his departure from this country, a hearty expression of sympathy and good feeling towards him was given by the meeting, which Mr. Morse gratefully acknowledged.—Sunday, 29th ult. A general business meeting of the Glasgow Association was held in the forenoon, when various matters of more or less importance were discussed, chiefly the question of ways and means relative to the further engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis. The treasurer's financial report revealed the significant and encouraging fact that notwithstanding the increased outlay consequent upon the maintenance of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis as resident lecturers and mediums, the funds of the Association at the end of the six months were in a better condition than at the commencement. The subscriptions to the Wallis Guarantee Fund for the next six months already amount to more than half the requisite sum, so that the re-engagement of these good workers was speedily and non. con. concluded at the meeting referred to.—Mr. Wallis read a short address cordially acknowledging the kindness which had been shown to Mrs. Wallis and himself, and said that they personally had no claim to be regarded as leaders, ministers, or teachers, and no ambition whatsoever in that direction. Their desire was to be co-workers with the members and servants of the spirit-world, endeavouring to understand their mediumship and develop it, as well as to grow wiser and live more and more in harmony with the teachings from the higher life. During the last six months they both had felt that their mediumship had developed considerably and their susceptibility increased, but with this increase the need became more urgent for harmony in surrounding conditions and circumstances, for the fuller and more successful exercise of their mediumistic gifts. He concluded by expressing a hope that hearty and harmonious co-operation might characterise the labours of the Association in the future even more than in the past, that they should come to know and understand each other better, and in unity and good fellowship work so that the blessing of God might crown their efforts. At the evening meeting the guides of Mr. Wallis spoke on the subject of "Scepticism, Free-thought, Spiritualism," and delivered an able and substantial address.—ST. MURDO.

ORTHODOXY.—Many old theological notions have certainly been modified by Modern Spiritualism; but the old orthodox still hold nothing as to the future life beyond the hope and faith based upon the recorded resurrection and ascension of their Lord and Saviour. When Spiritualists would present them with what one might think congenial testimony, based upon actual demonstration of continued spiritual existence, they repel them and call them all sorts of bad names! Can this be because the revelations of this Spiritualism do not include the orthodox hell?—Rev. G. Walters, Unitarian.—Harbinger of Light.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

- W. NUTTALL.—Your kind words are fully appreciated.
- L. ALLEN.—Plates were sent. We hope they came to hand all right.
- J. W. SHARPE.—You have been duly entered as a subscriber to "Present Day Problems."
- T. G. STODDART.—The chromos were duly despatched. We do not know the book you mention.
- T. HAYLE.—The number of "LIGHT" you asked for was out of print before your letter came to hand.
- R. H. FRYAR (Bath).—Five "Mental Magic" have been sent to the publisher named, as requested.
- G. PIDDLE.—Please send your items of news earlier in the week. We will then give them place with pleasure.
- J. PHILLIPS.—The pamphlet you mention was printed for private circulation only, and they are now entirely out of print.
- C. J. ATKINSON.—Thanks for narrative. It will be used in due course. Though silent we have not forgotten the matter.
- J. G. SREED.—Thanks. Though unable to write, we have been very glad of the advice you sent. Please keep us en courant.
- DR. J. C. STREET.—Card and pamphlet received with thanks. We hope an opportunity will occur for a personal interchange of views.
- T. WEEKS.—You had not been forgotten. You should have made the requisite application in good time.
- GEO. WALLACE.—You have been entered as a subscriber to "Present Day Problems." There is no need to remit until the book is published.
- E. KERRY.—A copy of "LIGHT" has been sent to the address given. We are glad you like the plates. It is quite refreshing to get some thanks.
- J. JONES (Keighley).—You did not comply with the very clearly expressed regulations three times published in "LIGHT."
- J. N. TIEDMAN.—A psychograph is now on its way. We regret delay, but the stock was exhausted and some difficulty was experienced in replenishing it.
- MISS MAJOR.—We know of Spiritualists in Brighton, but are not at liberty to mention names. Many apologies are due to you from us for the long delay in replying.
- F. E. BURR.—Sorry your plates got damaged. Have sent another set which please accept. We should like to see the articles you refer to. Could you not have the paper posted to us when any appear?
- JOHN SHAW.—Not suitable. After all, such information is only valuable in so far as it is capable of demonstration. Claims of the nature you speak of have been made, but never, as far as we can learn, by "civilised" men.
- F. PLASKETT.—Thanks. We shall be very glad to receive items of news. Unless, however, of a very high order of merit we cannot find room for communications of the kind you sent us. Our columns as a rule are too crowded.
- A. F. TINDALL.—Much as we would like to help you, it has been utterly impossible to give any attention to the matter. The books will be returned and if you care to send them back in a short time we hope to have more leisure.
- MRS. BOOLE.—Your letter and MSS. addressed to Mr. E. Dawson Rogers have been handed to us. When an opportunity occurs we will read it and write you on the subject. We have no lack of such contributions and each has necessarily to take its turn.
- G. F. GROSVENOR.—The plates packed as promised were sent on the Friday and crossed your letter. On inquiry we found that a set had also been sent with the copy of "LIGHT," thus giving rise to the complaint. You had not, however, been forgotten.
- A. GREGG.—Your MS. came safely to hand, but we have not had time to read it yet. Mr. Buxey's name shall be added to a list of agents we are preparing, and which will shortly be published. Your action in the matter has been very acceptable.
- MISS GLYNN.—The plates were sent in usual course, your interpretation of the instructions being quite correct. Did they reach you safely? The Psychological Review is "dead." There is therefore no id. to your credit. Please say how this shall be dealt with.
- MRS. T. (Weymouth).—The "instructions," as printed in catalogue of P.P., will doubtless help you. If not, write again. Use large paper—placing the psychograph upon the upper surface. We regret our inability to write privately, but if you experience further difficulty we will most surely do so.
- S. R. WATSON (Birkby, Huddersfield).—The major portion of your letter was answered in "LIGHT" for March 21st. Your remarks with reference to Mr. Barkas' articles will be dealt with by that gentleman if you will inform him whether your criticism on Nos. 5, 6 and 7 refers to the first or the second series of questions. Please say.
- E. W. WALLIS.—Memo shall be sent shortly. "LIGHT" is published on Friday for Saturday, and, although occasionally copies are posted on Thursday evening, we do not bind ourselves to do this, especially with packages sent by parcel post. At the same time, you may depend upon it that not a moment's delay is incurred. We are only too glad to complete our work. Remittance came duly to hand.

LIEUT.-COL. D.—Your order for "Present Day Problems" has been entered. We do not make a practice of recommending individual mediums. Why not experiment privately? There are a number of Spiritualists and inquirers near Aldershot, and if you wished we might possibly be able to arrange an introduction. If you will write again we shall be pleased to render you further assistance if necessary. Please, however, excuse a private letter this time.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Chavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBI, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will elicit noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an insipid and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER" AND MR. MASKELYNE.

My ring No. 2 has now been on Mr. Husk's wrist since the 28th January, and has been examined by about 500 people, including doctors, engineers, and practical mechanics.

As yet, no natural explanation of any weight has been attempted; but being anxious to get the most scientific opinion I could obtain on the matter, I applied to a distinguished engineer on the staff of one of our railways, to name the man whose opinion would be most valuable on this subject.

His reply was, "I know of no engineer who could give you so important an opinion as Mr. Maskelyne, for he is the most expert mechanic in London."

As this opinion coincided with my own, I wrote to Mr. Maskelyne, and he immediately replied; that my statements much interested him, and he would be happy to see the ring in its present position.

Accordingly we waited on him at the Egyptian Hall on Saturday, at two o'clock, when he, assisted by two other gentlemen, carefully inquired into the case, and minutely examined the ring with a magnifying glass.

Of course, he expressed his views with reticence, but from what he said to me, I believe he will have no objection to my giving the substance of his words thus formulated.

1. The ring is solid and without joint.
2. Apparently it could not be removed from the wrist intact without injury to the hand.
3. It could not have been hot welded in its present position.
4. Possibly it might have been cold welded, but this would be a process requiring a long time.
5. The fact of the ring being in its present position, was certainly the most puzzling thing he had seen in Spiritualism.

As to cold welding, I have consulted with an expert, who said, "I have seen your ring, and it has not been cold welded, and if it were, it could easily be severed, as cold welding does not bite like hot welding."

The reader will perceive that these admissions are very important, considering the quarter from which they come, and are equivalent to a reverse judgment on the verdict passed by the Committee of the Society for Psychical Research.

Surely that Society cannot refuse to re-investigate the matter, unless, indeed, it is determined not to recognise any spiritualistic phenomena which transcend the powers of the telepathic theory to explain.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

I beg to say that the result of a careful examination of the ring upon Mr. Husk's wrist enables me entirely to concur in the opinion expressed by Dr. Wyld as to the verdict of Messrs. Barrett and Gurney, respecting the phenomenon in question.

May I add that some years ago I, in company with "M.A. (Oxon.)," paid an impromptu visit to one of the then best known mediums in London! He showed us a ring upon his wrist, similar in all respects to that on Mr. Husk's. To attempt to remove it by natural means was clearly an absolute impossibility, as it could not even be forced over the carpal extremities of the radius and ulna. The medium expressed his determination not to have it removed, except by the same means by which he averred that it had been placed there. We proposed to try a séance, and, sitting down, we each grasped a hand of the medium; I myself holding the hand above which the ring was placed with a grip which would have done credit to a drowning man. While doing so I heard the sound of metal falling on the table below my hand, and on requesting "M.A. (Oxon.)" to turn up the gas with his disengaged hand, we found the ring, which I need scarcely say we had carefully examined before sitting down, lying upon the table. No other ring was to be found upon the arm from wrist to shoulder. Other phenomena occurred which it is not essential to my present purpose to mention.

St. Leonards-on-Sea, S. T. SPEER, M.D., EDIN.

April 3rd, 1885.

Dr. Speer has read to me his account of the séance, in the course of which a ring was withdrawn by abnormal means from the arm of a medium. My memory entirely corroborates his account. I examined the ring carefully before the sitting, and advised the medium to have it filed off if he wanted to get rid of it. There is no doubt in my mind that the ring was withdrawn by abnormal means. I tested it by ringing after the sitting was over, and examined it thoroughly. It was a sound iron ring, through which the medium's hand could not pass.—"M. A. (Oxon.)"

"ANGELIC REVELATIONS."—The fifth volume of this work is now ready for private circulation. Any of those friends who have the four preceding volumes and would wish to have the fifth will please to communicate with William Oxley, 65, Bury New-road, Higher Broughton, Manchester. The enclosure of sixpence in stamps for postage will save time, and an acknowledgment of receipt is requested.

SOME of the American scientific periodicals are giving articles on spiritual phenomena which remind us of the truly philosophical researches of our own scientists: Crookes, Wallace, Zollner, Barrett, and the other eminent men whose names are a tower of strength and a refuge from ridicule. It may be a pity to need such a refuge—but when fools are throwing mud, a wise man may ward it off with his umbrella.

FAITH healing, it appears from a letter in the Standard, occurs among the Buddhists. A girl, whose foot had been twisted in childhood so that she could not walk upon the sole, was cured by a visit to the Pagoda Bethshan, and an English officer sent to investigate the matter reported that the cure was established on evidence as good as would be required to sustain a criminal conviction. We have often said that the testimony to the verity of spiritual manifestations would be considered good enough to hang a man by any jury.

TELEPATHY AND THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

I beg to thank Mr. Gurney for his brief and clear statement of what he considers the Society he represents implies by the term "telepathic."

He says: "The term is applied by us to all effects produced by one mind on another, otherwise than through the recognised channel of sense. It no more implies any sort of physical affection than does the word sympathy."

On this I would remark that the word sympathy is popularly used to express mental or spiritual affection, but the word telepathy has been framed to express an occult theory; and it seems to me, after reading the article, "A Theory of Apparitions," in Part VI. of the Proceedings of the Society, that the word and theory have a physiological rather than a psychological basis and import.

When it is said the word telepathy is applied to the action of mind on mind, it is signified that minds in the flesh are meant, and that the Society has not yet recognised the action of spirits on mind, and still less the action of spirits on matter.

It is quite legitimate that the Society, in deference to the materialism of the age, should progress by careful steps; but, on the other hand, members of the Society should not, without prudence, attack the evidence for spiritualistic phenomena.

They should not, for instance, rashly volunteer to imitate a thousand marks produced by fire and hammers on an iron ring, with a pin in a few hours; nor should they offer to imitate spirit-writing on a ceiling, with the assistance of a pencil at the end of a broom-stick; nor to remove an iron ring, measuring, say 8, without rupture, over an impediment measuring, say 9, if some one would lend them a hammer.

With reference to Mr. Gurney's criticism on my remarks as to the impossibility of brain waves produced by brain vibrations penetrating the nine coverings of the brain and then creating like vibrations and thoughts by penetrating the nine coverings of another brain, namely, eighteen substances of various densities and various refracting powers, I would reply;

True—light passes through glass, but not through wood, and sound passes through wood, but not so well through glass, and electricity passes through other substances. But even electricity has a difficulty in passing through the various textures of the body, as is shown by the shocks received; and as brain vibrations must be physical, they must submit to physical law and be refracted and disjointed in passing through the various coverings of the brain.

But mind, in its spirit condition, can pass through all substances without shock, and travelling, possibly, by a magnetic wire, can convey its thoughts to a distance, and even at that distance create the objective forms of its imagination.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

THE presentiment of approaching death is not uncommon—but it is often vague and unreliable. A boy, ten years old, at Colesville, New York, wrote on a piece of paper: "Within twelve days after to-day, on Friday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, something remarkable will happen." He was in perfect health when this was written—but his funeral took place on the day and hour.

MR. EGLINTON'S VISIT TO ULVERSTON.—We referred last week to the efforts of a Mr. Gowland to discredit the results of Mr. Eglinton's work at Ulverston. On reconsidering the whole matter, it seems to us Mr. Gowland is not worth powder and shot. He gives certificates, and withdraws them when convenient, alleging as an excuse for such an extraordinary course that he "did it for a purpose!" In another quarter, he says he did it to show "how easy it is to gull people in that way." Well, if a man likes to tell a lie he can hardly be surprised if the character sticks to him. Above all, Mr. Gowland's methods and tricks are flimsy. He attended one séance only, and thereupon seeks a little notoriety by professing to show "how it is all done." We simply remind Mr. Gowland of the old adage about the fools and the angels.

PHENOMENA OF MATERIALISATION.

We extract the following from a letter bearing the signature of Hiram Gregg, an old Spiritualist, in the Religio-Philosophical Journal:—

I have just returned from a visit to John Campbell, a wealthy farmer near Winchester. I met old friends under his hospitable roof, partly with the view of being present at a séance with Mrs. Mendenhall, the medium of Winchester. A goodly number assembled, nearly filling the spacious parlour. A little adjoining room was converted into a cabinet by suspending thick, dark curtains over the door-way. In this the medium, Mrs. Mendenhall, took her seat alone, and the light in our parlour was subdued to a bland twilight.

The friends then engaged in singing. After a little the curtains parted, revealing the form of a man: after several attempts, as if against the action of the light, he came before the curtains, and was recognised as the son of a lady present, who was much affected!

Upon his retiring, another male form, of different stature, appeared, after similar hesitancy. He was also recognised.

After more singing, a voice called out from within the cabinet, "Massa Gregg's son." The curtains parted, and the form of my dear son, Clayton, was well recognised by several who knew him.

At his withdrawing, the same voice called out "Massa Gregg's daughter is coming out." We continued singing, and presently a female form emerged from between the curtains, arrayed in a flowing robe of dazzling white; her angelic mien thrilled all. My daughter would be now twenty-eight years of age.

Other spirits, male and female, seven in all, of various ages and forms, came out and were recognised.

Next evening the same friends met, with some additional ones, bringing with them a musical accession in the form of two harps and a violin. After the preliminary hymn, several spirits came out successively, with less hesitancy. Among them was Lydia, daughter of my friend Mrs. Haynes, present with her mother. Lydia passed away three years ago just as she, a bud of promise, was blossoming into womanhood. She appeared in flowing gossamer drapery of silvery white, with a dark scarf of lace-like material, richly embroidered. She looked bright and gay; with angelic hands she threw back her golden tresses, and moved with graceful steps to lively music from the instruments. She threw kisses to her mother, and, as she withdrew, gave farewell waves of the hand to the friends. Her mother, overcome with emotion, asked, "Is little Gertie here?" A voice behind the curtain said, "She is trying to materialise." Gertie was another daughter, who passed away in her ninth year. The curtains parted, and there stood a little angel, radiant with grace and loveliness, standing at the curtains as if waiting for aid to enable her to reach her. She gazed fondly at her mother. This seemed impossible. At length she retired, throwing kisses to her and her grandmother, and bowing a farewell to the friends.

Thus went on the manifestation of one spirit after another, all being recognised except one, a brawny form in regimentals, until ten had appeared, making, with those of the previous evening, a total of seventeen.

These séances have marked an era in my life, fraught with more exalted revelations and tangible demonstrations of the indestructibility of the human soul, and the return of our loved ones, than any before in my previous thirty years of investigation.

MR. LOCKERBY advertises on our front page for books for the purpose of forming a free Spiritualist library. We shall be glad if any of our readers can help him in his endeavour.

REVIEWS.

SYMPNEUMATA: OR, EVOLUTIONARY FORCES NOW ACTIVE IN MAN. Price 10s. 6d. Edited by Lawrence Oliphant. Edinburgh; Blackwood and Sons, London; may be obtained of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.

The peculiar character of the celebrity achieved by the author of "Piccadilly," will cause this book to be received with no small curiosity. After being—according to "Kosmos," in the World for July 4th, 1883—in great part simultaneously member of Parliament, diplomatist, mystic, and votary of fashion, Times Paris correspondent, financial expert and religious enthusiast—in which two last-named capacities he started a company to assist the fulfilment of Divine prophecy by enabling Jews to return to the Holy Land; and eliciting from Lord Houghton the remark that he was habitually in doubt as to whom he ought to serve, God or Mammon, Harris or Delane,—Mr. Oliphant has at length settled down in the haunts of the Prophet Elijah, namely, upon the slope of Mount Carmel in Palestine, there to formulate, and thence to promulgate the results of a thirty years' study of Spiritualism, or, to use his own words, of those forces in nature which have their manifestation in psychic phenomena, nearly twelve years of which period were passed in the United States under the spiritual direction of the arch-mystagogue of the Pacific slope, Mr. Thomas Lake Harris. Not that Mr. Oliphant is himself the immediate author of the present book, or professes to enunciate in it Mr. Harris's doctrine. He appears but as its editor, having acted as amanuensis to take it down from the dictation of one "who, shrinking from publicity, desires to remain unnamed." But it none the less embodies his own convictions and experiences. Nor is any reference made to Mr. Harris, saving only to indicate him as a co-believer with Swedenborg in the fundamental tenet of the book, a reticence for which no motive is assigned. We have reason to believe, however, that it embodies, with a few and not very important differences, the teaching of the Western prophet: in which case that which we have before us may be defined as the system of Mr. Harris as modified by Mr. Oliphant, and expressed by his unnamed collaborator, being, we are led by internal evidence to suppose, dictated in trance or some allied abnormal condition, by a sensitive of a highly refined and probably feminine organism.

Such, however, is only the human and secondary agency concerned in the production of this book. Its real source is transcendental, as its writers understand the term; and its first object is to expound the nature of that source and exalt the entities concerned. These belong to no category recognised either by Spiritualists or by Theosophists, since they are neither departed souls nor living Mahatmas. Neither are they elementals or elementaries. Nor are they, again, the interior and higher Egos insisted on by "The Perfect Way" as the only channels of Divine communication, although on this point and on certain others the language and the doctrine bear a verbal resemblance to those of that book. The differences between them are, nevertheless, radical and fundamental, as will be seen as we proceed.

Respecting the class of experiences upon which this book is based it is, we are told, the normal phase "of which we have had from time immemorial abnormal antitype in magic, mediumship, Spiritism, and cognate phenomena"; and which, "like physical malady, is a malady of the spirit representing the effort of nature to escape the greater harm, while at the same time its character has been distinctly that of disease." But since it has its use in reminding man of the spiritual nature of existence, the "presence of such phenomena in the past is regarded with leniency, and dogmatic judgment is not passed upon them as consisting wholly either of inspiration or of infestation." They are, however, altogether behind the present times, since they are incompatible "with any advanced degree of the new volume and quality of consciousness which we describe as sympleumatic," and in which it is "impossible to stand without being aware that in time the universal consummation of this development will expose every mystery issuing from the sub-surface degrees to the broad daylight, and leave the whole range of the spirit, or sub-surface, world as an open book, old and disused. For the life of the future in all its experiences will pivot upon a more solid and deeper foundation" (pp. 209-13). When man has rebuilt himself upon this foundation, he will "open the doors of moral sensation to the higher regions of active force," and "obey the fundamental law of nature in him. . . the law of seeking only always the good of all the world." "A finer quality of nature broods above the earth at this fresh crisis hour, and penetrates the race. The sensible sign of this life infiltration lies for each individual in his increasing faculty for deepening and enlarging the field of consciousness, until it opens up the spaces where the lost delights of biune entity make play and inspiration" (p. 216). "The whole historic life of our planet thus resolves itself into inspiration and obsession; inspiration in and through that which is real in man; obsession, in and through their earth-borrowed outer organism" (p. 220).

Not to multiply citations, this book indicates a keen appreciation of the fact that the world is entering upon a new era, and of the change as consisting in a vast enhancement of the spiritual consciousness. It claims to be written from a standpoint at once ethical, philosophical, and religious, and is redundant of passionate lamentation over the world's unhappy condition in the present, and of aspiration towards a blissful future, the path to which it describes as consisting in the regeneration of the race by means of such equal development of the masculine and feminine qualities, as will make each individual a representative of the whole humanity. Thus far no one can fail to sympathise with the theme of the book, and to recognise the high qualities which have concurred in its production, as well as to respect the courage involved in its publication and in the avowal of its authorship. We specially emphasise this last point, since the book really does contain, as stated in the preface and introduction, "much to excite criticism, ridicule, and aversion," and even "scorn and contempt," from the vast majority of persons. Even we ourselves, although awarding it a meed of praise, are compelled to restrict this to but certain features of it; and to visit the rest with condemnation. But the last thing we should think of doing would be to blame the expression of any confessed "immense conviction," however mistaken we might think its grounds or mistaken its nature. This is because we believe, first, that men ought to have the courage of their opinions; next, that freedom of opinion and expression are indispensable to the correction of error and ascertainment of truth; and lastly, that the prevalent crass ignorance, concerning man's nature and destiny, is mainly due to the intolerant repression of personal testimony by the dominant orthodoxies, religious or scientific, wherever the experiences concerned have been considered likely to conflict with vested interests. Hence in framing our indictment on this occasion we shall be careful to maintain an attitude of sympathy and respect for the writers, and where we find them mistaken regard them not as the authors, but as the victims of their error, not as the misleaders, but as the misled. And we shall do this all the more readily that we recognise the reality of their experiences, and believe their error to be one only of judgment as to the nature of those experiences, and due to a too restricted range of study and the lack of a sufficiently fine sense for the apprehension of spiritual things.

The doctrine, briefly stated, is as follows: There is nothing in the universe but matter and God: the former subsisting under two broad divisions, the solid and the fluid; and the latter, who is the actuating energy of matter, being personal and bisexual, in the physiological sense of the term, and generating man directly in His own image. Wherefore, instead of representing the return of spirit from matter by orderly and gradual ascent through the unfoldment of his potentialities from the lowest forms of life, "the original human creature was a pure and creative form of the Divine humanity of God," at once androgynous and fluidic, consisting "of men-women and women-men." "Its absorption into itself, by acts of its free-will, of elements from the subordinate animal world, caused the initial disturbance of pure order on the planet," by "precipitating the period of reproduction," through the "wilful and conscious opening of the human nervous organism to influences originating in the lower animal degrees of creation." The result was that his "outer casing became relatively solid"; "the consciousness of the inner processes of his life became closed, while his dominant consciousness began to reside in the activities displayed in that overlying system, by which the lower creation now claimed affinity with him," and "he drew into himself the forces of brute sexuality" (pp. 4-7), and all "those positive qualities of ferocity, rapacity, cruelty, jealousy, stupidity, filth, and scortation, whose foul fumes then began to percolate the fine spaces of human beings" (p. 113). And "so the reproduction of the coarse flesh-form followed, after the fashion of the lower creation, and resulted in males and females, and not in the biune man" (p. 111).

The fault, however, was neither that of the animals, who were but passive agents in causing it; nor was it altogether that of the biune man himself. For the "first influences of evil to which the race fell a prey in its infancy, did not form a part of the original individuality-consciousness of the race, but approached it from without, as from regions beyond its own proper sphere of activity, and through avenues which it had inadvertently opened" (p. 54); and it is probable that "the intelligent beings, who, from the outside, first established a disastrous influence on this earth's infant humanity, were some of those whose perverted will-activity had brought about a physical dissolution of that previously existing globe in our solar system, whose untenanted orbit science has vainly endeavoured to account for" (p. 51).

But "when or how, or in what individuals or races of this earth's humanity, the change" occurred which resulted in the lapse of mankind from a "fluent" to a "solid" state, and the "severance of the external form into appearances exclusively male or female" (p. 105), such fault as there was on the human side, lay with the woman; for it consisted in the "self-banishment of the woman part of man from her own place and function. Her defection of old was in truth the beginning of sorrows, as her abnormal position remains to this day the pivot of the world's distress" (p. 107). It was, however, nothing to the credit of the man that he was not the one to blame, since humanity was so constituted that its fall could occur only by the first failure of its feminine side.

Thus parted into two and become solidified, and the consciousness of biunity lost, "there is no manner of uniting the male and female forms of beings externalised as halves after the fashion of the earth's inhabitants, so as to produce a combination that will be biune, and that can absorb the biunity of full life-currents. The external contact of two mutilated images, devoid of the faculty by which particles mutually inflow, can neither produce nor reproduce the biune human form. . . . Men, despite the solid imitation of manhood that they make in their garb of flesh, are empty throughout the fine spaces that pervade them. Women, beneath their fanciful array of unlasting charms, are nude of the enveloping strength that should complete them. This is a state of things during which, so long as it continues—based upon the 'sex-nature of brutes'—there is no hope, nor vestige of a ground of hope, for a satisfying change of circumstances among the Divine children here" (pp. 143-4). The tokens of the advent of the being, through whose instrumentality the race is to be reconverted into its proper condition of fluidity and androgyny, are rapturously greeted, and the nature of the process and advantages of the change profusely expounded, its organic and physical character, and the sensuousness of its effects being strenuously maintained. Termed by Mr. Harris the counterpart or counterpart angel, it is termed by Mr. Oliphant the Sympneuma—an equivalent compounded from the Greek. And whereas according to Mr. Harris it is separated from man by difference of place, and waits, in its paradisaical home, the time when by his regeneration man shall be fitted for reunion with it; according to Mr. Oliphant it lies, latent and unformulated, in man himself, being constituted of the fluid—meaning not liquid but ethereal—matter which occupies the spaces between the grosser particles of his body, being in virtue of its interiority of place and mobility of substance, the immediate residence of Divinity. Its reunion with man "is effected solely by virtue of his organic reception of the Sympneuma's organism within his own," and brings to him "sure power and outgrowing from pure and perfect sensational delight of sex" (pp. 145, 147). "He craves not now the commerce of the dissevered sexes, nor the production of fresh peopling in their forms: for he lives now in the expanding chambers of his own sub-surfaces, where the Sympneuma's presence pervades and satisfies sensation" (p. 149). And when a man "has once experienced by repetition the unerring tendency of delight, intense, sensational, to visit him spontaneously, the painfully-acquired enjoyments that he knew before, of body, intellect, or spirit, fade and grow valueless" (p. 273). As if in order that there may be no mistake about the material nature of the experiences thus described, it is further stated that "the immanence of God in man now becomes a physical fact; as physical as marital affections, as maternal emotions, but more absolutely and unmistakably physical; and acting upon the surface with an intensity superior to that of any other known sensation." For "what happens when . . . the man opens himself, purified, to the reception of the Divine elemental fire of sensation, is, that he finds its quality is of sex" (p. 26). And "he who feels God thus . . . finds that this quality is of sex duality" (p. 20).

The condition of attainment of her proper completeness by woman involves not only her total separation from the other sex, but also from all external activities. She must renounce the "mad career" upon which in the present age she has entered, by withdrawing "from the stage-boards of publicity, independence, and self-gratification, upon which she has scrambled; and, shrinking alike from the immodesty and the anxiety of a false position, sink back into the home of her inner self, into the sweet quietude of absorption there" (p. 15). Such is the "first call of the Mother-Father now to the earth-daughters" (p. 157). Doing this she will lose indeed the satisfactions of wifehood and motherhood; but she will be freed from the anxieties and self-sacrifices attendant upon them, and even already in case of those "men and women who begin to know themselves as biune, and who rule their lives by the clear intuitions that arise in their biunity. . . . no provision is made for the continuance of earth-peopling after the fashion of the past, the instinct for it having fallen utterly away." But although there will thus be a "partial suspension of race production," "human beings will have the power of greatly extending the length of the terrestrial career" (p. 181-2), by continuing to inhabit the earth as fluent, androgynous entities unseen of its still solid denizens.

It would naturally be supposed that having thus lost all attraction for and need of each other, through the expulsive power of the new affection for their respective Sympneumata, the separation between men and women would be complete. We are assured, however, that the contrary will be the case. "As yet," indeed, "the masculine and the feminine natures confront each other in stupid misapprehension or mistrust, mitigated only by their mutual dependence for services or for entertainment. Even among the higher specimens of either sex, it requires on one side or the other, a daring of confidence that is not often upheld in long experience, for them to risk devotion to one another's existence." But under the new conditions, when instead of men and women there are men-women and women-men, and each individual is biune and complete in themselves, we are told, "men"—by which is meant those whose interior sex is feminine, "will not fear to trust in women"—or those whose interior sex is masculine—"when their impetuous impulses spring forth at the call of the human need; woman will no longer fear to give an absolute devotion to the careers of men, when these cleave by their lives the ways to the whole human happiness." But they will be able, when the fulness of the time shall have come, "by joining hands throughout the earth in clasp of perfect comradeship, to grow abreast into the full development of their time" (p. 159).

MELCHIOR. By Mr. W. G. Wills. London: Macmillan and Co., or may be obtained of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.

This is a poem, of which a very distinctive feature is its complete originality in almost every respect. It is in blank verse of such beauty and rhythm as has rarely been written since the days of Shakespeare, of whom Mrs. Browning wrote, "He is the most wonderful artist in blank verse of all in England, and almost the earliest." "We do not even say what we might, that his hand first proved the compass and infinite modulation of the new instrument; but we do say that it never answered another hand as it answered his. We do say that this fingering was never learned of himself by another." Whether Mr. Wills has learned from Shakespeare or not cannot be said here, but indubitably, not only in this poem, but in many of his dramas, we have "this fingering" of such excellence as none since Shakespeare have displayed. Moreover, the language and the wonderful painting in every line show the author to have a gift such as Keats has shown in "Endymion," and the "Eve of St. Agnes." The poem opens with the description of a quaint old town on the Rhine, of which the following lines may serve as a specimen:—

"The convent walls rose from the river bank
Beyond the bridge tower of the Upper Town,
And, as if fusing in the fleeting water,
The red old walls are doubled down again,
Breaking and wavering, weaving a red tissue;
Now seems a writhing fragment floating off,
And then it joins again the spectral wall.
This was the very confine of the town,
Save for a desert garden 'neath its shade,
Encircled by a fence of weed-grown rubble.
Here basked and roosted meek conventual heirs,
And sipped at the green pool; after each sip
Upraising piously a grateful beak."

In the description of Melchior's garden is the following:—

"Tall queenly lilies towered in scented ranks,
White troops of spirits looked they, rapt and waiting
For some disciple of the olden time,
Or martyred saint to come and raise the hymn
Which slumbered on their curled and marble lips;
White gossip butterflies, flirting mid-air,
Now flapping on a flower at radiant whim,
Now gadding on the wind without a goal,
Haunted the place—and slightly knew each flower."

These are by no means the best examples of such delicious word painting as has previously been seen only in the poetry of Keats, who, had he lived in this world for half a century, might have given us, out of his ripe experience, joined to the poetic gift, such a poem as "Melchior."

What will, however, be of greater interest to the readers of "LIGHT" is the remarkable spiritualism of the poem. Melchior, who for years had been visited by visions of holy saints, is recalled to earthly life at length by the love of a woman, and seeing her die, is almost instantly comforted by the palpable presence of her spirit, who continues to be near him during the brief remainder of his earth-life. His friend who comes to sympathise with him finds that—

"His sighs suppressed were burden to a pean.
It was as if a man should lift his hat
To jovial wedding rout that passed his road,
In solemn faith a funeral went by;"

"But Melchior's secret heart was in a summer,
Mute with the joy sublime of young immortal
A joy so intimate that asketh not
For envy's incense, in itself complete."

And when Melchior gives back to his friend the portrait he had painted, his friend says:—

"How can I take it? 'tis thy last memorial.
'Nay, friend,' said Melchior, 'she is with me still,
And bids me give it back, and say to thee,
'Be comforted—shed no more tears for me.'
Ah, Haas, she is more lovely—lovelier far."

When the priest urges him to pray for deliverance from these delusions, Melchior says:—

"I am at peace."

But call not fantasy this visitation
Of one I knew, I know, and I have seen
Daily since her release, as palpably
As thou sees't me, clasped as my hand clasps thine.
Her soundless step I feel, when she glides in,
Her gaze, the pretty wistful gaze, I greet
With lulled delight, all yesterday 'twas on me."

To extract yet finer passages than are here given, and there are many such, or to give here an outline of the story told in the poem, would be to do the utmost injustice to the author and to his work. Beautiful as the jewels are, they must be admired in the harmony of their setting, and the web of silk and gold which binds them, exquisitely true and lovely as it is, cannot be laid bare of rich and necessary growth of adornment so deftly interwoven. Enough to say that the web of life displayed in the poem is wonderfully true, and conveys deep instruction to those who will seek beneath a surface, which is of itself of such beauty as to allure even the chance gazer.

There is a completeness in the work which would have been wanting had the writer stopped short at the earth-life of humanity. But while he puts before us humanity in various phases he goes beneath the surface, as few can do, and proceeding further he takes us beyond the grave to the absolute reality of the after-phase of our existence, and of the communion of the freed spirit with those yet in the flesh. Probably few books on Spiritualism will do so much to spread its truths among cultured readers as is likely to be accomplished by "Melchior."

THE TRIUMPH OF TIME. Mystical Poem. By Ella Dietz. A Sequel to "The Triumph of Love." London: E. W. Allen, 4, Ave Maria-lane. 1884. Price 4s. 6d.

Many who remember with pleasure "The Triumph of Love" will turn with interest to the present volume by the same writer. We shall not attempt to explain the "mystical" idea which is intended to run through the book, nor can we criticise to any great extent the way in which the authoress has carried it out. There is no more difficult task to the artist, whether in word, in colour, or in form, than to take the symbols of the earthly, the sensuous, and so to infuse them with the spirit that no trace of discord or incongruity remains. The difficulty is perhaps greatest when the symbolism chosen introduces the highest truths of the Christian faith.

We do not wish to quote special poems and verses in which the writer appears to have failed in her endeavour; and in which the result seems deficient in that dignity and power which justify the attempt.

The charm of the book lies in the exquisite songs interspersed through its pages, and in verses here and there, which are in themselves beautiful little pictures. The following lines from an "Interlude" entitled "Winged Sleep," are almost perfect, both in conception and in execution:—

"Lo! in the night with my arms wound around thee,
I carry thee far to some clear limpid stream,
There where my love hath recaptured and bound thee,
I kiss thee at will in thy deep mystic dream."

"Child of the lotos, and pearl of the ocean,
Queen of my bosom, and queen of the air,
I call thy deep soul to receive my devotion,
And whisper delight to thy spirit most fair."

"Day may divide us, but night-time unites us,
Dreams shall restore us to music and love,
A dream of enchantment that lures and invites us
To groves of sweet spices, the home of the dove."

"What though our feet tread the earth on the morrow,
To-night we are winged, to-night we are free,
Let me drink deep of joy, forget earth and its sorrow,
And bask in the love-light of Heaven and thee."

Occasionally, but rarely, a more heroic strain is attained. In the "Valediction," at the close of the volume, the muse dwells upon the immortal theme of all true poets—"The yearning for the beautiful denied them," as Mrs. Barrett Browning describes it:—

"Who builds the Temple of Eternal Beauty,
With colour fair, inlaid with precious stones,
Lays down his life before the feet of duty,
And cares not where shall rest his weary bones;
To seek and find that kingdom of great worth,
With scrip and staff content he fares him forth."

"He feels not pain, he feels not body's fasting,
His joyful spirit heavenly visions sees,
Enamoured is he of the everlasting,
And worshipful he bends upon his knees;
On noble deeds his mind is fixed intent,
In frequent prayer his head and body bent."

Such a book as this will, of course, strike different minds very differently, according as it harmonises more or less with their own feelings; but to ourselves "The Triumph of Love" would seem to have deserved a more vigorous, and, if we may use a commonplace word, a less sentimental "sequel." B.

The Resurrection Body.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The statement made by "Lily" as to the resolution of a human body into its original elements and gases is one that is so startling that I think it would be well to have chapter and verse for it. If true it is a most important fact in its bearing on the investigations of Spiritualists. It is obvious that the statement, as made at present, has no value as exact evidence. Can "Lily" put us in the way of verifying what she alludes to? April 6th, 1885. A SPIRITUALIST.

A Deserving Case.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Through your columns I beg to tender my sincere thanks to those philanthropic and benevolently-minded friends who, at Mrs. Everitt's appeal on my behalf, have forwarded contributions towards my support. I can assure them that these have proved an important relief in my circumstances. But it is employment that I am really standing in urgent need of; and most respectfully, but not less earnestly, I implore the many friends who may be able to assist me in that way, to try and rescue me from the painful position in which I have found myself placed for these last three months. Confidential servant, gentleman help, assistant correspondent, or travelling companion—any one of these positions would be in harmony with my abilities and educational gifts.

I have Mr. S. C. Hall's authority to mention my being personally known to him, and I can show excellent testimonials.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

JOHN H. POLLEN.

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.

In August, 1860, there appeared in the Coruhill Magazine an elaborate article written by the well-known littérateur Robert Bell, entitled, "Stranger than Fiction." The article consisted of minute and carefully-prepared details of a series of phenomena witnessed by the writer, and vouched for by him as a bald statement of incontrovertible facts. So marvellous were the records that Thackeray, who was editor of the magazine at the time, appended with proper caution the following note:—

As editor of this magazine, I can vouch for the good faith and honourable character of our correspondent, a friend of twenty-five years' standing; but as the writer of the above astounding narrative owns that he "would refuse to believe such things upon the evidence of other people's eyes," his readers are therefore free to give or withhold their belief.—Ed.

Spiritual phenomena in their modern form had been before the world for examination about twenty-five years, and prominently for twelve years at the time of the publication of the Coruhill article. Since that date a quarter of a century has passed away, and during the whole of that period the strange phenomena of modern Spiritualism have been urging their claims for recognition on a reluctant and Sadducean world. Facts similar to those recorded by Robert Bell have been over and over again investigated by some of the most critical and judicial minds of the civilised world, and by all who have fully and carefully examined them they have been acknowledged to be genuine. There is, certainly, not an absolute consensus of opinion as to their origin, but there is complete conformity of opinion as to their objective reality and genuineness.

The following names of sceptical investigators who became finally believers ought to command respect even from men so prejudiced and Bohemian as are Dr. Lankester and Mr. Labouchere:—Prof. Hare, Judge Edmonds, Dr. Dexter, Epes Sargent, Charles Beecher, President Lincoln, Lloyd Garrison, Wm. Howitt, Benj. Coleman, Dr. Ashburner, Dr. Elliotson, Prof. de Morgan, R. Chambers, Robert Stephenson, Andrew Leighton, Prof. Crookes, Alfred Russel Wallace, Dr. G. Wilkinson, S. C. Hall, C. Varley, Profs. W. F. Barrett, Zollner, Weber, and Butlerof, and hundreds of well-known literary and scientific men. Many of those named are yet living on earth. Why, instead of scorn and virulent abuse, do not some representative organisations, say the Royal Society, or some other learned and recognised society, depute intelligent and representative investigators to examine, and ascertain the facts, as committees of the House of Commons search for facts, through the examination of competent witnesses? There are hundreds of cases in which the facts are accepted though they have not been investigated and proved by a twentieth part of the competent witnesses who have for many years tested and proved the reality and genuineness of what are termed spiritual phenomena.

It may be freely admitted that, with the opinions respecting natural laws that are at present generally held, it would be in the last degree absurd to accept the alleged phenomena of modern Spiritualism without overwhelming evidence from numerous competent and credible witnesses, or the personal evidence which is the result of long and patient investigation. To accept the generally recorded phenomena of Spiritualism without one or both these phases of evidence would be indicative of considerable credulity; whilst, on the other hand, to reject them without examination, notwithstanding the abundance and quality of the evidence offered in their favour, would be indicative of a conservative bigotry and prejudice not excelled by the theological prepossessions of the Middle Ages.

We affirm with Huxley that the "assertions that outstrip evidence are not merely blunders, but crimes," and that the littérateurs who contribute to their respective papers the absurdly ignorant diatribes against spiritual phenomena and Spiritualists, are simply ignorant, prejudiced, criminal blunderers who dare not honestly look well-accredited facts fairly in the face. They constitute a combination of cowardice and ignorant bigotry, or something worse, which need not be named.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO INQUIRERS AND INVESTIGATORS.

For a long period we have devoted a considerable amount of time and trouble to answering the inquiries, and endeavouring to set at rest the difficulties, of investigators. We can do so no longer. There has come a limit when it is impossible for us to keep pace with all the demands upon our time, and we must now rigidly confine our attention to the editorial duties connected with this journal. These, to tell the truth, are in themselves more than enough, without clerical help, for one pair of hands. We regret we cannot continue to do as heretofore, but we hope some one else will undertake this service. As such work comes rightly within the sphere of the London Spiritualist Alliance, we have little doubt that the secretary of that body will cheerfully do what is necessary. We can, from experience, promise him plenty of work.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—The next conversation of the Alliance will be held on Friday, April 24th, in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, when Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, will deliver an address, his subject being "There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." We hope members and friends will take note of this engagement, and hold themselves free to be present on the occasion.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of this Society will be held on Friday, April 24th, at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, London, S.W. The President of the Society, Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., will take the chair at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which will be partly of a conversational character, is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to invite friends. Papers to be read: (1) Mrs. Sidgwick—Notes on the Evidence collected by the Society for Phantasms of the Dead. Part II. (2) Edmund Gurney, Esq., and Frederic W. H. Myers, Esq.—Some Higher Aspects of Mesmerism. Note.—Members and associates will be admitted on writing their names at the door. Persons who do not belong to the Society will be admitted on the production of an invitation card, duly filled in and signed by a member or associate.—EDWARD T. BENNETT, Secretary, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W.

PAGANINI'S GHOST.

In Karoline Bauer's Memoirs the following story of Paganini and his ghostly violin is gravely told.

"Paganini died in Nizza on the 27th of May, 1840, after long and fearful sufferings: but the restless when alive was not to find rest even in death. The clergy refused him a Christian burial because he had not received the last Sacrament. The unhappy son had to take his father's body by sea to Villafranca, then to his country house, Polcevera, near Genoa; but the Bishop of Genoa also refused his consent to the interment, and the coffin stood for years above the earth in the villa. There, night after night, heartrending violin tones were heard, till the son arranged for a splendid mass for the peace of his father's soul, and made large bequests to the church. Then the spectral wailings of the violin were no longer heard at the coffin of Paganini, and the Bishop of Parma at last permitted the body, after five years' wanderings, to be taken to Parma and buried in the neighbourhood of the villa Gajona in May, 1845."

THE GOLDSMID FAMILY.

Lucy, in his most amusing "Diary of Two Parliaments," gives the following account of Kabbalistic influence on the Goldsmid family, which many a living Occultist would readily accept as true:—

"I heard a weird story in connection with the private history of the Goldsmid family. It is a tradition in the family, and generally with the Jews settled in England, that for nearly 100 years a fatal spell has overhung the Goldsmids, and facts show that in a manner, doubtless due to coincidence, but nevertheless remarkable, the spell has not failed to work throughout several generations. During the latter part of the eighteenth century there lived in London a Jewish Rabbi, alleged to be gifted with magical powers. This seer was known as the Rabbi de Falk. When he died he left to Aaron Goldsmid, great-grandfather of that Sir Francis who was killed in a railway accident at Waterloo Station, a sealed packet, with strict injunctions that it should be carefully preserved, but never opened. By way of enforcing this request, he informed the old Dutch merchant who founded the Goldsmid family in England, that if his instructions were obeyed he and his descendants would bask in the sun of prosperity till the coming of the Messiah. If his instructions were disregarded, ill fortune would finally overtake each successive representative of the race."

Old Aaron Goldsmid kept the packet, holding it sacred for some years (the story is too long for exact quotation, and I give in my own words the important facts), but his curiosity overcame him, and he opened the packet. A few hours afterwards he was found dead. Near him were the contents of the packet—a small piece of parchment covered with Kabbalistic characters.

Aaron Goldsmid had amassed a large fortune which he divided amongst his children. Two of his sons—Benjamin and Abraham—entered into business as money-brokers, and gathered together a colossal fortune. But the Kabbalist's curse worked, and on April 15th, 1808, being then fifty-five years of age—rich, honoured, powerful, and esteemed—he died by his own hand.

Abraham now carried on the business, and in 1810 joined the house of Baring in contracting for a Ministerial loan of fourteen millions. On him the curse seemed to rest. He vacillated; hesitated, and blundered. He became despondent, and finally, a sum of half-a-million being due on a particular day, he knew not where to put his hand on the money. At the hour when the sum was due it was found that Abraham Goldsmid was dead.

After an interval arose Isaac, a nephew of Benjamin. He was a great financier, amassed a large fortune, and was one of the principal founders of University College, London. He retired at sixty years of age with an English baronetcy and a Portuguese peerage, and spent the declining years of his life in childishness and vacuity.

His heir it was—Sir Francis—who was killed in the accident at Waterloo Station.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK. XXIII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

I see but one difficulty in the very remarkable statement of Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle. It is a possible theory of thought-reading. Did Mr. Barkas know the answers to his questions? Were they photographed, so to say, on his brain, where, though unconscious to him, a clairvoyant might read them?

Naturally, as any stick is good enough to beat a dog with, I lay hold of what I did not believe in yesterday, with which I belabour what I am unwilling to believe to-day. So mesmerism was absurd until we found it could explain some things in Spiritualism, while the mesmeric healings of the Bethshans explain the miracles of the Acts of the Apostles.

What we have to recognise as a living fact is, that the embodied spirit can sometimes display the same powers that it possesses when freed from the body. Most of us are tied up too tightly in matter for that, but a clear vision comes to some, and spirits can make good use of others.

The iron ring on the wrist of Mr. Husk, though seen and examined with more or less care by hundreds, has not, I am sorry to learn, been satisfactorily authenticated. If it still remain upon his wrist, there should be secured the sworn testimony of surgeon and engineer. We are careless of wonders when they become familiar. Then few persons can trust the oaths any more than the words of the witness of a fact that seems incredible. The Americans say: "I would not believe it if you swore it on a stack of Bibles!"

People with large "approbateness" and "caution" shrink from telling what they know to be true. They "keep probability in view." It required moral courage and conscience in Crookes, Zollner, and Wallace to give public testimony to the facts of Spiritualism. Many a man would rather fight Arabs in the Soudan than incur ridicule by telling what he knows to be true.

And telling the truth is not always a safe operation. A man's will might be set aside after his death, or he might be put into a lunatic asylum. These perils, as well as the lighter ones of ridicule and suspicion, swell the numbers of the Nicodemus Club.

"Faith has well nigh perished among us, and we are reaping the results in all the evils that are thickening around us," says the Pall Mall Gazette. Faith is fighting against us in the Soudan, and for us, with General Booth for a leader, in London. On the whole, we prefer knowledge to faith. Doubtless it is a comfort to many to believe in immortality, but it is scarcely conceivable that an absolute knowledge of the fact of a continued existence should not be more satisfactory than hope or expectation.

The vote of the whole Bench of Bishops for keeping the public picture galleries and museums closed on Sundays was quite ex-officio, and a matter of course. Looking at the works of God might interfere with "the foolishness of preaching." But the Bench of Bishops only made a tie, which leaves a handsome majority in favour of science and art, in the non-episcopal, unconsecrated Lords. Well, Hampton Court and Kew Gardens are open on Sundays to everybody—and the Crystal Palace and Zoological Gardens to a great many. When the Bishops have digested the Wife's Sister Bill they may, perhaps, be ready to swallow the British Museum.

The Rev. Sims Paine, a veteran New York preacher, says:—"About fifteen years ago, riding on horseback, I plainly saw Joseph Phelps, some eighty years old, whom I well knew, at my side on foot, keeping up with my horse whether he went fast or slow. He told me when and where he had died, and soon disappeared. In about ten days I got news of his death, which occurred just before the hour of the day on which I saw him." In a similar case Mr. Paine was told of the death of an old friend, and also who had preached his funeral sermon.

Sardou, the most famous of French dramatists after Victor Hugo, is a Spiritualist, and believes that he writes his plays under spirit guidance. This may be a delusion, but what can be said of the following account of the production of an exquisite engraving of Molière's house on copper? "Seated one day at my table," he says, "I fell into a reverie. Unconsciously I took up the graver, and, impelled by secret influence, let my hand follow its own direction over that plate. The engraving you see is the result of several hours of purely mechanical toil. I could not of my own will make such a picture to save my life."

Here is a bit from an account of a materialising séance in Indiana, U.S.A.: "The medium having taken her young son into the cabinet for better manifestations, the doors were suddenly thrown open by some unseen power, displaying an assembly of seven persons, large and small. They were all dressed in garments that shone like burnished silver, set with gems; while a most brilliant light shone upon them above. It formed the most brilliant and beautiful spectacle I ever beheld. When the doors were closed, they were immediately reopened and the medium and her son were found entirely alone as before."

Madame Blavatsky has converted an English clergyman, the Rev. C.W. Leadbeater, to Buddhism. After voyaging in the same vessel with Madame Blavatsky, he landed at Colombo to consummate his conversion to Buddhism. An eye-witness saw him seated at the feet of the yellow-robed ministers of Buddha, repeating after them, "I take my refuge in Buddha, in the Law, and in the Order." "The Pamsil was administered by the High Priest, the Rev. H. Sumangala, Principal of the Vidyodaya College, assisted by the Rev. T. Amaramoli. There were present many of the prominent native citizens of Ceylon."

When our English missionaries go to convert the Buddhists to Christianity what will they do with the Rev. Leadbeater? Or is it an even chance that they get picked off by Madame Blavatsky?

Twenty-three years ago, March 22nd, 1862, the following delightful paragraph appeared in the Illustrated London News: "We regret to see any implied encouragement extended, in any influential quarter, to the ridiculous quacks who call themselves 'spirit mediums.' Surely such impostors and their follies may be left to the patronage of semi-hysterical ladies with more money than brains, and who, weary of the ordinary dissipations of a silly life, and not able to find sensation in visiting their poorer neighbours or other works of charity, resort to the 'spirits' as a means of excitement. Such persons will always be committing some folly, and, except that the medium séance is a mixture of vulgarity and profanity, we do not know that a silly woman is doing much harm in spelling the alphabet she ought to be teaching. But nothing should be written that intimates any approbation of these wretched jugglers. They do their work exceedingly ill, blunder eight times out of ten, and are 'sold' with the most perfect ease, and their only success is obtained in a darkened room, and among persons from whom disbelievers—that is, people of sense—have been carefully removed. We send the gipsy to the House of Correction—these quacks may keep beyond the letter of the law: but their vocation is not at all more respectable than that of the brown beggar who wheedles the servant girl to steal the spoon in order to raise money to rule the planets."

The world does move, after all—slowly if you please, but it really moves; and the cry is now that men of science should investigate Spiritualism—as many have done and are doing.

My friend, Mr. E. T. Bennett, sends a capital ghost story to the Richmond and Twickenham Times. A lady, walking with her husband, in an avenue on the Surrey side of the Thames, from Richmond to Twickenham, saw a man, dressed as if he had stepped out of an old picture, in a costume of two centuries ago. Both saw him, and spoke of his queer way of dodging about as if spying on them—then, as if he had been shot from a gun, both saw him at a considerable distance. He then gradually became transparent so that they could see trees and river through the spectre form—then completely vanished. A very good old-fashioned ghost, but how account, on the illusion theory, for two persons seeing it?

A correspondent of the Methodist Recorder, considering that the facts of Spiritualism are proven to be true by many competent scientific witnesses, believes that it is a revised form of witchcraft and a device of our great spiritual adversary. He says if witchcraft did not exist, why the command to slay wizards and witches? The editor hopes the phenomena can be explained as either trickery or some occult force pretending to be a departed human being. If not, then it is Satanic. He admits, however, "certain appearances, especially those occurring at the moment of, or immediately after, the departure of the spirit from the body, of which the instances are too numerous and well attested for them to be wholly unreal." Now, why not do one of two things: find out by personal examination what is real, or set it all down as humbug, practised by knaves on fools?

And why is it that Christian editors who believe in a devil created by God, who foreknew that he would lead men to perdition, find it so difficult to believe in a ghost or other spirit manifestation? The writers of the Pentateuch and of the Acts of the Apostles had no such difficulty. Why go on blindly leading the blind, when a few hours' serious investigation would settle the case as to the facts, and enable the able editor to have some idea of what he is writing about?

The case of the Witch of Endor is curious and interesting, no doubt—but it happened a good way off and a long time ago. Why not imitate the open-mindedness of the Prime Minister, and have a séance or two with Mr. Eglinton, Mr. Husk, or any reputable and accepted medium? Why preach or write of what one knows nothing about and will not have the fairness to investigate?

The Whitehall Review still advocates a jury of conjurers for the trial of Spiritualism. Individual conjurers, such as those whose testimony is published in every number of "LIGHT," do not satisfy it. Empanel a round dozen and it will be satisfied with their verdict. But would Professor Huxley or Professor Ray Lankester be satisfied? Not one atom. They would say conjurers are professional mercenary liars, and the jury has been packed and bribed.

But in what way is a conjurer a better judge of what he cannot do than any man of sense? For example, I hold the hand of Mr. Eglinton, and one of my chairs is found threaded on my arm. All in the room examine it. No conjurer can do such a trick, and no one, of course, can tell how it is done. Maskelyne and Verbeck are equally impotent. One clever conjurer, in such a case, would be as good as a dozen. Rewards of from £50 to £500 have been offered for years to any conjurer who would do one of a dozen things commonly done in spiritualist séances, and no one has ever claimed such rewards. Conjurers, indeed!

The Whitehall wants to know why spirits prefer to use slate pencils for writing, and whether they are prepared to write their answers on a sheet of paper sewn in between two folds of carpet? Well, I can show this anxious inquirer spirit writings with lead pencils and with pen and ink, done in closed books, closed boxes, between two slates firmly fastened together, and other seemingly impossible situations. In nine cases out of ten no conjurer in the world could tell how it was done better than the simplest of clodhoppers.

Mr. Cook, in the prelude to his 172nd lecture, says the notorious Mr. Slade, whom Professor Zollner employed, has been before the Seybert Committee and has somewhat puzzled them. Nevertheless, Mr. Kellar, the distinguished magician, has agreed to parallel whatever Mr. Slade has done, and to explain how he did "it." Of course he did. When did a professional conjurer ever fail to give himself a good advertisement or to boast of what he could do? It is his trade, and he works at it. If conjurers can do what is done daily in spiritualist séances, why don't they?

DISSENT AT ROME.

FROM Le Messager (LIEGE).

In Italy the most prominent topic in home affairs, and soon to affect the entirety of old Christendom, is just now the Dissent in the Church. It furnishes an additional proof that Pio Nono, by his Syllabus, his dogmas of Immaculate Conception and Papal Infallibility, dealt a fatal blow to Catholicism.

We extract the following comments upon the subject, so exciting to Catholics throughout Europe, from our Spanish Spiritualist contemporary, the Revista de Estudios Psicológicos—

"The excommunicated founders of the dissentient 'Italian Catholic Church' have issued an encyclical in reply to that of the Vatican. It is signed by the dissentient Church dignitaries and priests—Monsignor Lavarèse, Monsignor the Count Campobello, and the priests Luciano and Capuo.

"In their encyclical, which separates them definitely from the Orthodox Church, they say, 'If the hearts and minds of Italians are to be eternally oppressed by the Vatican superstition, they must renounce reason, science, liberty, and all evolution of political life, and they must sink into degradation in the midst of progressive civilisation. We hold that harmony between the Papacy and progressive civilisation is impossible; at the same time, we maintain the possibility of harmonising such progress with the Church as founded by Jesus Christ.' They say, 'The Romish Church, according to St. Paul, is not, as he thought in the early time of his conversion, the root, but a branch; and this branch, not even a natural one, is sustained by the sole trunk, the Redeemer, and which, when injurious to the tree, He may cut off.'

"Among the many points in their encyclical is their insistence that the prayers of the Church should be in the language of the people, and not in obsolete Latin. It concludes: 'Our watchwords, as priests of religion, and as citizens, are, to honour the august head of the nation, and to cherish love of our country, in which, by God's providence, we were born men and citizens before being children of the Church.'

"The dissentients—the orthodox call them schismatics—thus openly declare war against the Vatican; so we may expect to hear its thunder rolling over their bold heads. Monsignor Lavarèse announces as being in the press a book entitled 'The Excommunication of Ideas: a reply to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome'; intended, no doubt, to be another arm in the conflict."

We have been asked to insert the following:—Dr. J. Comodore Street (recently arrived from Boston, Mass., U.S.A.) has kindly consented to give a discourse at Cavendish Rooms, 51, Mortimer-street, Langham-place, W., on Sunday evening, April 12th, at seven o'clock. His remarks will bear on the recent spiritual and psychical researches, now so popular amongst the educated classes in Boston; embracing psychometry, and "metaphysics" or the powers of the mind over the body. The steps that have been taken in these investigations will be pointed out, also the general results arrived at, with such practical hints as may be gathered from the dangers and advantages attending the investigation. This lecture will be a general introduction to a course of private classes about to be instituted, in which students will be introduced to a knowledge of the nature and properties of their psychical surroundings, and the spiritual relations to which these give rise. Instruction will be given in each individual case, how to control these unseen conditions so as to improve their quality, leading to the spiritual elevation of the individual, and the development of his latent mediumistic gifts. It is that form of psychical research which enables man to know himself, as the basis whereon to investigate the manifold wonders that surround him. Private classes will be formed, for a course of seven lessons, when twenty students come forward. Address: 16, York-street, Portman-square.

MESMERISM AS A CURATIVE AGENT.

(Translated from the Londoner Zeitung Hermann.)

There are extraordinary phenomena exceedingly difficult to explain, but which admit of proof beyond doubt or refutation. Amongst these may be reckoned the curative methods of the celebrated Spanish specialist, Mr. F. Omerin, who, by the application of his system of vital force unaided by medicine, has cured diseases which have baffled the skill of some of the most eminent medical men. That this statement is no idle assertion is proved by the testimony of numerous persons of undoubted integrity, who have been cured by him after having tried every other remedy in vain—persons who reside in London, and whose social position precludes all doubt as to the perfect veracity of their statements. And to these testimonies we can add our own experience; for Mr. Omerin has not only cured us of rheumatism in the right shoulder, but has also cured one of our intimate friends of a liver complaint of many years' standing, which none of the doctors whom he consulted were able to accomplish, whilst the complaint, as well as a throat disease of long standing, from which he suffered, yielded to Mr. Omerin's special treatment within a very few days. The diseases which Mr. Omerin so successfully treats, comprise, mainly, affections of the nervous system, and derangements of the digestive organs, the disturbed function of which he restores, imparting to the patient renewed life and strength, and thus re-endowing him with nature's most precious gift, which makes life dear to man—health!

According to the testimonies before us, Mr. Omerin has cured cases of neuralgia, sciatica, gout, rheumatism, epilepsy, headache, pains in the back and in the joints, failure of muscular power, paralysis, ophthalmia, and numerous other diseases, some of which had been treated in vain by experienced medical men, and in most cases the cures were effected in a very short time, although the complaints were often of long standing.

We publish these facts solely in the interest of suffering humanity; and are convinced that Mr. Omerin's method will, in the course of time, be more and more appreciated, although doubtless he, like all innovators who have to strike out a path for themselves, will have to struggle against opposition, to overcome many prejudices, and to disprove all kinds of antiquated theories. Truth is, however, stronger than prejudice, and facts appeal more eloquently to the senses than theories, and there is no doubt that he will ultimately succeed in overcoming all obstacles, and continue to relieve the afflicted, in spite of any opposition he may encounter, however powerful such opposition may be.

AN INQUIRY.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Am I right in concluding that there is no place in London (is there in England?) where I can find files of the various Spiritualist newspapers and magazines published in different parts of the world?

I am frequently away from this city, and upon my return I desire to look up what has been taking place during my absence; yet I am given to understand there is no possibility of reference of any kind owing to the want of a spiritualistic library. I am informed there is a society in London called the London Spiritualist Alliance, but that it has not a home nor even an address, and is consequently useless for the purpose I, and doubtless many others, desire. There used to be, I believe, a very fine library in Great Russell-street, to which, I understand, it was possible to get admittance upon the payment of a small fee. Is that library still in existence? for I have failed to find it at the old address. In the large towns of the United States I have always found Spiritualistic libraries, where files of newspapers are kept for reference, and it seems extraordinary that here in this vast City of London there is no institution of the kind, despite the continued assurances of Spiritualists I meet that their movement is making vast headway. There must be many others (I certainly know some) who have similarly to complain, and their impression must be as mine is, that if between them the Spiritualists cannot support a library or reading-room, they must be a very poor community or else a very apathetic one.

I write, sir, not in the spirit of offence, but with a desire to obtain the information I seek; and if this letter calls attention to the matter—of course, supposing I am correct in my information—the Spiritualists will have reason to thank

Charing Cross Hotel.

AN INQUIRING STRANGER.

April 4th.

P.S.—I am nothing if not practical, and do not wish it to be understood I am seeking an advantage at the expense of others. If there is a library, I will join it immediately, and pay double the annual subscription, as an evidence of my contrition in having troubled you with this letter.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

EDINBURGH.—Spiritualism, as far as public advocacy is concerned, has been at a standstill in this city for some years past. But the recent visits of Miss Rosamond Dale Owen, to lecture to the Secular party, has given a little stir to the subject, she on her last visit having advocated the cause in a lecture, and Mr. Lees, an active member of the society, having given one or two addresses on it from a Secular standpoint. On Sunday, March 29th, Mr. Gilmour, of Glasgow, also lectured on "Modern Spiritualism," prefacing his address by remarking that a man who stated that he investigated any subject with a perfectly unbiassed mind did not, to say the least, tell the whole truth; and he freely confessed that on the present subject, he was not free from prejudice. Still he would be as fair as he could, and began by giving a short description of the disturbances in the Wesley family, and in connection with the Fox girls of America. He then, in some detail, criticised the "Dialectical report" and spirit photos, which, singularly, were always very indistinct; he would like to know more about how they were taken. Rapidly passing over the "Katie King" affair in America, and Mr. Crookes' work, he finished up with comments on "Hafed" and Mr. Duguid's drawings, which he described as indistinct and in utter violation of all rules of art. "If spirits would save children from death by burning, and miners from explosions, and come and pour some sweet celestial music into the homes and hearts of humanity, it would be more practical than saving the heads of bald-headed old gentlemen from fire and strumming on banjos and guitars." Dr. Bowie, in reply, stated that he did not think there was any probability of convincing the lecturer; he had supplied us with an extraordinary number of facts; he confessed to an unseen intelligence on the part of the mediumship of the Fox girls; the séance attested by fourteen witnesses was quoted from "LIGHT." Yet because the lecturer had not seen such things they were met by denial, and it was asserted that they could have no existence outside the brain of a simpleton. What right had the lecturer to speak for the rest of the world? Surely, the testimony of such men as Crookes, Zollner, Wallace, and many others who have investigated the subject is worthy of credence? Of all men Secularists, as free-thinkers, ought to be the first to investigate the facts of Spiritualism. Mr. Rhodes spoke also in corroboration of the reality of spiritual phenomena, which he had witnessed over a period of some years. After a few remarks had been passed by others, the lecturer summed up by observing that it would be presumptuous in him to attempt to instruct Spiritualists; but if Spiritualism was a science it must be experimental and capable of being brought under the rules of all other experimental sciences. He was afraid, however, that if he were to see all the phenomena described by Wallace and others it would not be sufficient to convince him. One of the committee intimated to Mr. Rhodes that the Secular Society have three Sunday evenings vacant during the next three months, and that they would be glad to have a lecture on the subject from the Spiritualists' side of the question.

GLASGOW.—Sunday, April 5th. At both morning and evening services the guides of Mr. E. W. Wallis ministered to the spiritual necessities of the occasion. It being the first Sunday in the month, answers to written questions took the place of the ordinary discourse at the evening meeting. The questions covered a wide range of subjects, theological, scientific, philosophical, &c., and the guides of Mr. Wallis showed excellent form in handling them. Mr. Harper, of Birmingham, being present, the chairman placed the platform at his disposal for a brief space, when he (Mr. Harper) delivered one of his characteristic and eloquent tirades against the abuses which exist in the social and commercial conditions and relations of life. His remarks were attentively listened to, and elicited an appreciative response from the audience. A new experiment by way of extending the influence of the association through means of the services of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis and their guides is about to be tried. It has been arranged that divisional meetings of the members of the society shall be held once a week, i.e., week by week in the northern, eastern, southern, and western divisions of the city, consecutively, and that either Mr. or Mrs. Wallis shall visit each the purpose of carrying on the work. The members residing in the various districts will thus have an opportunity of bringing their friends or neighbours to a meeting which is held close at hand. The first divisional meeting is being held this week (Wednesday evening at eight o'clock) in the house of Mr. Drummond, and it is an understood thing that all members and inquirers in the East End are cordially invited to hear the guides of Mr. Wallis and put questions to them, with a view to eliciting counsel and instruction in matters pertaining generally to the subject of Spiritualism. Next Sunday Mrs. Wallis will occupy the platform. Subject: "Practical Thoughts for Daily Life."—ST. MUNGO.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

- W. OXLEY.—Thanks. The notice is repeated.
 MRS. WESTERN.—Letter was forwarded as requested.
 R. H. FRYAR.—Not admissible except as an advertisement.
 H. G. GARRATT.—Your name has been entered as a subscriber to P.D.P.
 N. C.—Your request will have been complied with by to-day (Saturday).
 F. OMERIN.—Glad to oblige you; the publication of such facts is also valuable.
 C. B. HANKEY.—The crystal is unsold. The terms you mention are quite agreeable.
 A. DARLING.—Apply to Secretary of London Spiritualist Alliance, 62, Granville-park, Lewisham, S.E.
 "CHAMELEON."—Your communication is hardly suitable for "LIGHT." Do you wish the MS. returned?
 F. EVERITT.—Your notices came too late for insertion last week. They appear in this issue. We believe the ring is still on Mr. Husk's wrist.
 GEO. FORSTER.—We were glad to receive your letter. It came to hand too late, however, and now the matter to which it refers is out of date.
 L. COLBY.—As far as we can remember, the poem of Professor Brittan's to which you refer was returned to him. It was not quite suitable for our columns.
 REV. E. P. LARKEN.—We intend to issue shortly a series of articles calculated to assist investigators in their researches. Why not visit Mr. Eglington?
 J. S. CHRIS.—Will appear next week. You have been entered as subscriber to P.D.P. You need not remit the subscription until the book is published.
 J. T. RHODES.—Thanks for communication. Kindly continue the good service. An announcement with regard to the chrono-lithographs will shortly be made.
 GENERAL CAMPBELL.—Order cancelled as requested. MS. shall be returned in a few days. We had asked a friend to complete its revision. "LIGHT" shall be sent as directed.
 W. H. BROWNE.—Inquiries and requests of the nature of that sent to us by you should be addressed to the Hon. Sec. of the London Spiritualist Alliance, 62, Granville-park, Lewisham, S.E.
 W. NEWTON.—We will call on Mr. Jacobs if opportunity serves, but our hands are already very full. The alleged confession appeared in "LIGHT" for August 12th, 1882. Kindly excuse a personal reply.
 J. C. BUNDY.—"Earth's Earliest Ages" was reviewed in "LIGHT." We send you a copy. If after reading that you wish for the book, we will send it, but we think it is not worth anything. Pray excuse an answer in this column instead of writing direct.
 JOHN H. POLLEN.—Your letter appears in this issue. We went to press early last week in consequence of holidays; hence its exclusion. Why, however, should you jump to the conclusion that we "deny" you its insertion? You could not have been surprised if, after what you wrote, we had consigned it to the waste-paper basket.
 L. S. BROWN.—The MS. entitled "The Uses of Pain and Evil" has been returned to you. The delay, which we regret, was unavoidable. It has not been possible sooner to spare the time necessary for hunting the MSS. up. Pray convey our apologies to your relative, and if you can make peace with her for us, please do so.
 H. SWAN.—In the matter of such an obscure question as materialisation, careful investigators work from what they know to what they do not know; you desiderate the opposite course. As a matter of fact, however, all the really important conditions you would impose, have been observed. Read current and past records.
 S. W.—It is not any use arguing upon proved frauds. Despite your experience (which, alas! is that of many others also), there are numerous instances which show that "fraud" will not cover the whole ground. Our duty is, therefore, to sift the false from the true, and base our conclusions on the latter.
 W. T. BOWEN.—The investigation of Spiritualism requires care, and above all, great patience. Some obtain results speedily; others, only after a considerable time. You cannot do better than follow the instructions given in "Advice to Inquirers," a column which often appears in "LIGHT." You might also use the Psychograph. Read also "M. A. (Oxon's)" works, and other works which will be found advertised in our columns. Write again if there is anything you do not understand.
 JOSEPH D. HALL.—We do not encourage the style of writing you mention, but we never yet refused to insert an article because of any fear that it might cost us subscribers, few or many. "LIGHT" is thoroughly independent of any man or set of men. But so far as we are able to do so, we strive to meet the demands for publicity of the various "schools of thought," if we may use such a phrase, into which students of the occult are divided in this country. It is true we do not always succeed in pleasing everyone, and every now and then receive letters threatening all sorts of penalties. These, however, we can afford to pass by.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S. President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliottson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Haro and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavaire, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of Russia and France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HODDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBI, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Party, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER" AND MR. MASKELYNE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Dr. Wyld took an obviously sensible course in consulting Mr. Maskelyne as to the ring question; and thinking it important that Mr. Maskelyne's opinion should be given in an authoritative form, I sent him Dr. Wyld's report of what he had said, with a request that he would let me know how far his view was accurately represented. He kindly allows me to publish the following reply. I am not at liberty to quote here, for comparison, the report on the same subject made by Professor Barrett and myself, since the journal in which it appeared has only a private circulation. But members of the Society for Psychical Research will see that, so far from Mr. Maskelyne's verdict reversing ours as Dr. Wyld asserted, the two are entirely concordant.—I am, yours faithfully,

April 13th, 1885.

EDMUND GURNEY.

DEAR SIR,—Dr. Wyld's description of his interview with me, as published in "LIGHT," is substantially true as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough to convey my opinion of the matter correctly. The following is the substance of the interview. After carefully examining the ring I said, "I believe it to be perfectly sound and properly welded; it could not have been hot welded in its present position, but it might have been cold welded; that, however, is a process requiring great pressure and considerable time. In its present form I believe it would be a very painful, if not impossible, operation to get it over the hand, but whether by well soaking the hand in hot water and bending the ring into a pear-shape it could be got on, is a question rather for a surgeon than a mechanician."

Dr. Wyld then produced a loop of soft wire, which he stated was exactly the size of the ring. The medium tried to get his hand through the loop, but appeared unable to do so.

I said, "It is a pity that in this manifestation, as with all others I have investigated, the spirits appear to have left a margin for trickery. I have often suggested tests which, if accomplished, would have conclusively proved the existence of supernatural power. For instance, if this ring is put on as you describe it, surely the spirits could as easily put a ring round the medium's neck. If you will try the experiment I will construct a ring in such a manner that there could be no possibility of joining it round the neck. In my opinion, such a manifestation would do more to advance your doctrine than all the literature ever published." Dr. Wyld replied that he believed such a thing had been twice accomplished in America, but it was a dangerous experiment, the ring having to pass through the spine, and the spirits (or whatever power it was) did not like to attempt it. In conclusion Dr. Wyld said, "Will you permit me to state that in your opinion the ring could not have been put where it is by natural means?" I said, "No, I cannot state that, but you may say that I believe the ring to be perfectly sound."

I must say that from Dr. Wyld's letter I quite expected to see a ring of much stouter metal, and so closely fitting the wrist that there could have been no question as to its passing over the hand. I may remark that it is easier to get a ring over the hand than to get it off again.—I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

J. N. MASKELYNE.

Nevil House, Albert-road, Battersea Park, S.W.
13th April, 1885.

THE Banner of Light reports that Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, Cleveland, members of a church, have become developed, suddenly and reluctantly, into mediums, one phase of their mediumship being for communications by telegraphic signals. These come upon a slate enclosed in such a manner that no mortal hand can come in contact with it, and experts in telegraphy are satisfied with the genuineness of the phenomenon.

ROME.—La Liberta, Rome, inserts an article from the joint pens of M. Hoffmann and Baron Daviso, defending Spiritism against the attacks of certain ignorant writers and false savants, styled by them, enemies of all progress. The appearance of such an article in a Roman daily paper shows that truth is well advancing where hitherto it has moved only with steps, painful and slow.—Le Spiritisme.

Le Spiritisme comments upon the sermon preached by Bishop Elisando in the Protestant Cathedral of Mexico, a translation of which appeared in "LIGHT." It says that he demonstrated that the time of the coming of the Spirit of Truth, prophesied by Jesus, is the present; that old dogmas are fading away before the light now being diffused. Le Spiritisme anticipates that the Bishop's sermon will have a great effect on the American continent.

A PREDICTION.—Soon after the birth of the child who afterwards became Alexander II., says the Moscow Gazette, his horoscope was cast by a predictor of events, much consulted at that time by the Russian aristocracy. Of the newly-born the prediction was, "He will be good, he will be great, he will die in red boots." The last enigmatical part of it was solved when, as will be remembered, the bomb whose explosion caused the Czar's death shattered his lower extremities.

FRANCE.—Le Spiritisme gives a list of twenty groupes, societies, or circles, in Paris, with the ir times of meeting. At some of these there are conferences on experience, readings from spiritual journals, &c.; at others narratives of facts and discussion thereupon; at others communications through various mediums; at others sittings for development; at others communications through mediums about health, and magnetic healing. Its correspondent at Bordeaux writes that the Spiritists there have legally enrolled themselves as a society, and have taken larger premises for the accommodation of their increasing numbers, as well as for the numerous applicants for treatment by healing mediums. Among the patients recently there were four, quite cured of diseases which had baffled the skill of Bordeaux physicians.

A PLEA FOR UNBELIEVERS.

Unbelievers in Spiritualism are accustomed to receive, from time to time, in this journal, somewhat severe castigation at the hands of the various writers, many of whom are doubtless able and accomplished critics. Now, it occurred to me, in thinking over the subject, that these criticisms are very often, nay generally, rather unfair, and always one-sided; and this arises, I think, not from any desire on the part of the writers to be unnecessarily severe in their attacks on unbelief, but from the fact that they fail to realise the exact position and circumstances in which outsiders and investigators find themselves with regard to this subject. Of course, I do not pretend to ignore the fact that there are a sort of men whom bigotry, conceit, or prejudice, have totally unfitted to form any just opinions on the matter. For example, men who attribute the accredited phenomena to diabolical influence, or those who, like Tyndall, profess to have no interest in them, even though they may be true; with such I have no sympathy, nor are they to be defended for a moment, but I am inclined to believe that these are not so numerous as some suppose, and that the majority of unbelievers are so, not wilfully, but because they cannot help being so. Men do not, and cannot, refuse to believe, simply because belief and unbelief are conditions of the mind utterly beyond the control of the will, and I am unable to conceive that any one is responsible for either the one or the other. This fact is thoroughly recognised by some religious sects, who, in order to evade the difficulty, make belief or faith to be a Divine gift.

Now, I have only one conception of belief, and that is, that it is a perfect conviction derived from evidence; and when the evidence is sufficient, it is inevitable, irrevocable, and entirely independent of either our wishes or our volition; so that one cannot, on the one hand, believe what one chooses to believe, or disbelieve what one chooses to disbelieve.

Now, I venture to maintain that if the phenomenal evidence of Spiritualism were sufficient, no rational being could avoid believing: this may, perhaps, be objected to as a petitio principii; but I think this is only apparent, for the causative link between evidence and belief is thoroughly recognised in all the affairs of daily life. I can quite conceive of a man being traitor to himself, and denying his belief, though I am at a loss to account for his doing so.

The position, then, I wish to assume is this, that the vast majority of inquirers upon the subject of Spiritualism find, when they approach the subject seriously and earnestly, as I have done, that there is little or no evidence to be got. I speak from experience. By evidence I mean, of course, personal observation. Right or wrong, people will not accept such a startling theory merely on the ipse dixit of others, however truthful and trustworthy they may be. There may possibly be some who would be unconvinced by evidence which, to the great majority, is conclusive; but these are exceptions. I feel certain that the world at large would not, nay, could not, hesitate to believe, what Spiritualists profess to believe, could they but fairly see what Spiritualists declare they have seen. But they cannot do so. I will take myself—if the egoism may be pardoned—as a typical example. For two years I made the most strenuous endeavours to obtain personal evidence of the phenomena; and I feel sure that had I but seen the hundredth part of what I was told, I should have been an earnest believer—I could not have helped myself. I cannot say that I had no evidence whatever; but I do say that what I did get was very trivial and insignificant compared with what I ought to have had, seeing that I was in London, a member of the Spiritualists' Society, and a personal friend of one of the most distinguished and well-known leaders of the movement in the Metropolis; and but for whose kindness and courtesy I should never have seen anything at all; and I trust that that gentleman will not feel hurt or offended if he should read this, when I say that the little which I saw, though it certainly arrested my attention, was insufficient to induce belief. Now I am residing in a large town in the North of England, where there is not a vestige of anything spiritual to be heard of, much less seen; and yet, to read what some writers say about these phenomena, one would suppose there could possibly be no difficulty in witnessing them. Nor is my case solitary or exceptional. I have met with many who bewail the same dearth of evidence, and I think that, not long since, a correspondent in this journal made the same complaint. I was comparing notes with a friend who had been investigating, and he remarked that his experience was, "Out goes the light, and in comes the conjurer." The fact is that it is of no earthly use for a gentleman to tell people that his fires are lighted and his breakfast laid, together with other phenomenal wonders, by unseen powers. No one will believe it, for the reason I have given above—that they cannot. Nor will the highest position and authority of the asserter save him from the suspicion, if not of fraud, at least of being the victim of delusion or deception.

This Thomas-like attitude of mind, if not consistent with the highest conceptions of faith, is, at any rate, the condition of the great majority in this practical world of ours.

Spiritualists are very prone to draw parallels between the phenomena of Spiritualism and those of physical science. In one respect, at least, all parallel fails; I mean with regard to the facility for observation. If anyone were anxious to witness some scientific phenomena—e.g., the polarisation of light—why, in a large town there would be dozens, if not hundreds, ready and delighted to exhibit them. When I wanted to investigate Spiritualism with a view to conviction, the editor of this paper very kindly inserted a long letter of appeal which I addressed to the readers for help. Now mark. I got about three replies to that letter, but not a particle of help of any sort. I therefore ask, in all earnestness, what conclusion would an unbeliever naturally come to? Either that there were no phenomena to be seen, or that there is very scant courtesy among Spiritualists. Well I know upon which horn of that dilemma I got impaled. I do most earnestly believe that, in spite of the bigotry begotten by creeds, and the materialism which seems to dog the footsteps of science, there are thousands upon thousands who would gladly believe, if they could, that the dark veil which separates the known present from the unknown future had been drawn aside, that the horrid abyss that yawns between the seen and the unseen had been bridged over, and that the awful silence which broods over the hereafter had been broken by words of joy and peace from the spirits of our departed friends. Oh! it is a grand idea, but the belief in it can never come from the occasional records by a few persons of phenomena which are at the best very questionable, and alas! too often gross and palpable frauds.

I am aware that it is often argued that the greater part of our belief is based on the evidence of others, and that if we only believed what we could ourselves see and verify, we should believe comparatively nothing. It is not my wish, even if I had the ability, to discuss this question as to why it should be so; but it is manifestly the fact, that either from the nature of the subject, or the nature of the phenomena on which the inductions are founded, people cannot apply the same canons of belief to this subject as they do to the more indifferent matters of life. I suppose it may be partially explained by the fact that a great deal of what is called belief is merely a sort of passive assent. In the casual matters of life, people rarely question themselves or others as to the ground of their so-called belief; but when such vital questions as the re-appearance of departed spirits, or phenomena involving a violation of all known scientific laws, are brought under their HOMES AND WORK IN THE FUTURE LIFE. By F. J. Theobald. Price 1s. 1d. post free. The Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.

This, the latest contribution to the literature and theology of Spiritualism, by an earnest and enthusiastic writer, will be welcomed by our readers. Miss Theobald reproduces from her extensive journal of automatic messages, given through her own hand, some of a most interesting character, and such as are adapted to fix and rivet the attention of all devout and serious investigators. They are rendered especially attractive by a number received from a young Independent minister, who passed to the higher life many years ago, and of whom the medium could have known nothing, either as to his person, his history, or his position in life.

It is not a book to criticise, but to commend—as we heartily do—to the perusal and judgment of our readers.

The messages throughout are broad and stimulating, and comprise answers to questions of higher import than are usually proposed at mixed sances. They controvert very satisfactorily the hypothesis that all such information is supplied by thought-reading; give additional stimulus to the investigation of the facts on which Spiritualism rests; and furnish material for the clearer recognition of its beneficent truths, so full as they are of vital interest to humanity. They will do much also to absolve Spiritualism from the frequent charge that its revelations are shadowy where they are not silly, and will be found to provide satisfactory answers to the querulous cui bono of the sceptic and the materialist.

We shall be glad to see further extracts from Miss Theobald's journal. In the portions already published the highest morality and the noblest principles are inculcated.

Every such book is a mission from the unseen—a seed which, in spite of mental aridness and theological cavilling, can hardly fail to find fit soil wherein to thrive and bring forth fruit.

SYMPNEUMATA: OR, EVOLUTIONARY FORCES NOW ACTIVE IN MAN.

Price 10s. 6d. Edited by Lawrence Oliphant. Edinburgh: Blackwood and Sons, London; may be obtained of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C.

In forming our estimate of this singular—no less than dual—production, we have not been unmindful of the duality also of the aspects under which its editor and sponsor has been wont to present himself in his writings, namely, as a humorist and a mystic; but have carefully kept in view, as a problem requiring solution, the question in what character he appears on this occasion, whether as humorist, or as mystic, or, as on some former occasions, both together. With his recent anti-Theosophic jeu d'esprit, "The Tibetan Sisters," so fresh in the public mind, it seemed to us an invincible a priori improbability that Mr. Oliphant should venture, by putting forth a bond fide confession of his own faith, to afford the author of "Esoteric Buddhism" the opportunity of retaliation, the desire for which must have caused him fervently to exclaim of his critic, with the sorely-tried patriarch of old, "O, that mine enemy would write a book!"

Nor has our perusal of the volume served at once to reassure us of its serious intent, so numerous and apparent in it are the touches of that subtle and caustic humour of which Mr. Oliphant has the command. For such, in our view, are the substitution of the terms solid and fluid for material and spiritual; the presentation of spirituality and specific gravity as mutually interdependent, with the consequent ascription of spiritual impurity to solid matter on the ground of its physical density, and of spiritual purity to tenuous matter on the ground of its physical rarity; the conception of man as an hermaphroditical jelly-fish, yet nevertheless man, and becoming separated into man and woman, and acquiring a body—as if it were a contagious disease—through contact with the animals; the ascription of man's visible presence on earth, not to the divinely appointed order of things, but to an accidental and preventible violation of that order; and the introduction of evil into this planet by importation from another, after Sir William Thompson's grotesque notion of the introduction of life by a meteorite, with the like avoidance of the real problem involved—that of the existence at all of evil or of life; the assumption that men and women will be better friends and more closely united to each other when they consideration, even careless people become careful, and thoughtful people rigid in their reasoning, and exacting in the conditions of the phenomena. In conclusion, I repeat, that if it be an acknowledged fact that the world cannot accept the asserted phenomena of Spiritualism except on their own personal observation, and that under circumstances exceptionally free from all suspicion, there is but little chance of increased belief while the evidence, if it exists, is so supremely difficult to be obtained.

S. W. WATSON.

[Perhaps some of our correspondents will reply to Mr. Watson.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

ANCIENT WRITING THROUGH A MEDIUM

The Religio-Philosophical Journal quotes the following from the Northern Budget, Troy:—"Mrs. Newton Reynolds, of Troy, is an inspirational speaker and a writing-test medium. Her gifts have been progressively developed during the last seven years. Writing has occasionally come through her hand in a character unknown to all until lately. Last year the manuscripts were submitted to a medium, through whose hand it was written that they were in an Eastern tongue of 6,000 years ago, allied to the Hebrew and Assyrian. Professor Kelke, from Europe, settled in Troy last October. He had been a student of the languages of the East, Hebrew, Arabic, Syrio-Chaldaic, and Sanscrit. He was invited to a séance with Mrs. Reynolds, and receiving some remarkable tests through her hand, continued to attend her séances for investigation. These antique writings being shown to him, he pronounced them Syrio-Chaldaic, but could not make out any sense from them. While talking about them, the medium's hand was controlled, and wrote in similar characters from right to left. Her hand had previously always moved in the ordinary way, from left to right. The writing now was intelligible to him. Although Mrs. Reynolds is a lady of great intelligence, she has received no more than an ordinary English education. She is a medium in private life, and, having no need, receives no fees."

The idea that a certain belief is essential for salvation unsheathed the swords and lighted the fagots of persecution. So long as Heaven is held to be the reward of creed instead of deeds, just so long will every orthodox church be a bastille, every church member a prisoner, and every priest a turnkey.—Ingersoll.

DR. ASHBURNER used to relate to Spiritualist friends that when he was in full practice, he was one in forming the Life Insurance Company of which he was one of the directors, the qualification for which was his subscribing for a certain number of shares, quite compatible with the means derivable from his extensive practice. The last call upon his shares, a thousand pounds, came after he had become impoverished by his practice having very much dwindled through the persecuting machinations against him, by pen and speech, as a mesmerist, by the orthodox. His wife would have raised the money upon her own property, but being vested in trustees it was unavailable. He tried to sell the lease of his house at Hyde Park Corner, but this required time. So on the evening before the day of payment he found himself still without the means. In the morning, very early, his servant roused him, telling him that a mounted messenger was below who would not say what his business was, only that it was urgent and that he must see Dr. Ashburner himself. Bewildered, he hastily dressed and went down. The messenger, without getting from his horse, held out a brown paper packet and beckoned him. He told the servant to go and take it of him. "The man," said the doctor, "asked if I was Dr. Ashburner, and on telling him that I was, said that his orders were to deliver the packet only into Dr. Ashburner's hands. Seeing his determination, I stepped out and received it from him; and, without heeding my question as to who sent him, he immediately rode off. That packet contained new Bank of England notes to the amount of my need, unaccompanied by the least scrap of writing, and with them I saved my good name with my position."

have become entirely separated from and indifferent to each other; the supposition of forces now active in man, other than those which have always been in operation; the patronising reference to the Kabbala as possessing a "dim glimmering" of religious truth; the presentation of the natural relations of the sexes as pure and holy, or as foul and sinful according as the parties concerned inhabit the same or different bodies; and—as a closing climax to our by no means exhaustive list—the daring, rather than humorous, association, as cause and effect, of divine influx and voluptuous physical sensations.

Nevertheless, for reasons, for the recital of which we have no space, we are satisfied that the book is intended in all seriousness, and constitutes a bond fide expression of its writer's convictions. This is to say that it is intended to be, not humorous, but mystical. To decide this, however, is still to leave something undecided, and this is the important question in which sense of the term revelation it is meant. For revelation is of two kinds, an unveiling, and a revealing or clothing again in symbol and allegory. Were it, indeed, a revelation in this sense, and an allegory of which, according to mystical usage, the real and the apparent significations are diametrically opposed to each other, much of our objection to it would probably fall to the ground since, however injudicious might seem the form selected, the import might then be altogether different to that which appears on the surface.

Glad as we should have been to accept this explanation, if only for the sake of the writers, and to regard the book as an allegory, having a spiritual signification and veiling lofty truths, we find no grounds for so doing. On the contrary, it is given, not to a select few who may be presumed to have the key to it, but to the world; and it professes, not to propound new enigmas, but to solve old ones. Wherefore, there is no alternative but to accept it as intended literally, as plain-speaking and in no way allegorical.

Not that it is in the true sense mystical, although doubtless intended and believed to be so by its writers. For the mystical refers not to things, or persons, or events, or aught that is material and sensible, of time or of place, even though they be fluidic instead of solid; but to principles, and processes, and conditions, which are interior and spiritual, eternal and universal, and the keys to the apprehension of which are the words now and within.

Spiritual verities are of necessity expressed in terms derived from the physical plane, since it is to that plane that language itself belongs; but the choice of expression is determined by correspondence, and the thing said is not the thing meant, but is only a symbol for it. And, according to all instructed exposition, in all times from the earliest, in sacred Scripture, and in intelligent commentary, to ignore the spiritual signification for the material representation, is to miss or pervert the meaning, and to commit idolatry. Such literalism was altogether eschewed by initiates of those mysteries which, under the name of Hermetic, constituted the core of all sacred Scriptures and religions. It was denounced as childish by several Fathers of the Church; and Swedenborg but restored the ancient canon when he insisted that "to take the literal meaning for the true one is to destroy the truth itself, since everything in the Word relates to the heavenly and spiritual, and becomes falsified when transferred to a lower plane by being taken literally." (T.C.R., 258.) For, "in the internal sense there is no respect to any person or even anything determined to a person. But there are three things which disappear from the sense of the letter of the Word when the internal sense is unfolded, namely, that which is of time, that which is of space, and that which is of person." (A.C., 52, 53.) That Swedenborg failed egregiously at times to observe the rule he so clearly perceived and formulated, does not invalidate its authority. The book before us follows him only in his failure.

Scripture itself, moreover, constantly affirms its own parabolic character, saying of its own apparently-historical narratives, "These things are an allegory"; warning against "the letter that kills"; and beseeching those who have the "ears to hear and eyes to see" the interior and hidden sense of the Word; the reason being that, as stated in "The Perfect Way," religion is addressed to the soul and not to the senses. (L. VIII., par 24; see also App. I, &c.)

This book, on the contrary, sets at naught all established precedent, and instead of discerning in the Bible a dramatic allegory of the soul's history, as perpetually in course of enactment, whether in macrocosm or in microcosm, in the universal or the individual, in the world or in man, from its first descent, unindividuated, into—not the place—but the condition of matter, and of its return thence by orderly unfoldment of its Divine potentialities, taking up with it the man it has mothered, regenerate, and made "in the image of God" in virtue of his attainment of all the mental and spiritual qualities, masculine and feminine, which appertain to the Divine-human; and instead also of seeing in the terms "Fall," "Redemption," and other allied expressions, the various spiritual acts of the Soul necessary to be accomplished by and in every person, it regards them as denoting events occurring in time and place and to persons, and as altogether physical and historical in their nature. Thus, it makes a certain act committed by certain individuals at a certain time the cause of all subsequent human imperfection and misery—the act itself being of a specific and physical nature—and accounts for the presence of evil on this planet by supposing it to be imported from another, namely, that of which the Asteroids are supposed to represent the disruption, the idea of what we call evil being the necessary result of a creation involving aught other, and therefore less, than God, not being at all entertained. It interprets the Pauline expression, "spiritual wickedness in high places," to mean wicked spirits; it regards the penalty of the Fall, no less than the Fall itself, as physical and consisting in a physical change in man's constitution and structure, whereby from being fluid he became solid, and from being bisexual he became unisexual; it wrests the term "Woman" from the proper signification universally accorded to it in all mystical scriptures, namely, the Soul—whether in man or woman or any living entity—to make it mean a woman, and the term man from its proper use as denoting the outer personality, whether of man or woman, to mean a man; and it makes the condition of salvation—which also it represents as a physical process, having physical results—not the regeneration of the man and the attainment of his soul-consciousness and the knowledge of God, by means of inward and spiritual purification, but his conversion into an androgyne by incorporation with a second personality of the opposite sex, and his ultimate fluidification—the supreme aim and result of the process being an indefinite enhancement of physical sensation. And as the basis and justification for this doctrine, a physical application is given to the Kabbalistic terms employed to denote the duality, under manifestation, of the Divine nature, and that which is but an ultimatum and symbolical expression is read back unchanged into original and substantial Being.

It is true that the divine-human Spirit, when disclosing itself to the spiritual perception of the seer, appears as possessed of both forms complete, the masculine and feminine. The experience of to-day in this respect is that of all ages, and confirms the Hebrew and other scriptures cited in the book. But this does not mean that divinity actually is of such, or of any, form. It means only that the human dualism is the divinely appointed symbol of the divine fecundity, and other attributes, functions, and qualities, all of which necessarily become dual under activity, since it is only by means of opposites or contrasts that manifestation and cognition can occur.

So far, moreover, from the process of regeneration implying the addition to the individual of another personality of the opposite sex, the effect would, in numerous cases, be precisely the opposite, taking the term sex in its spiritual sense. For the change produced would be according to the change required to perfect the character. Thus a man deficient in respect of the spiritual characteristics of the masculine kind, such as force, courage, intellect, would acquire completion by becoming yet more masculine in these respects; and a woman deficient in the distinctive qualities of her sex, such as tenderness, endurance, intuition, would acquire completion by becoming yet more womanly; the function of regeneration being to develop all the qualities of both sexes and establish perfect equilibrium between the two halves of the spiritual humanity.

The necessity of repeated and manifold experiences, far beyond those which can be obtained in a single earth-life, in order to afford the requisite opportunities to this end, is one of the grounds urged on behalf of re-incarnation, or repeated rebirths of the permanent Ego into the body. According to this doctrine, the Ego, which in itself is of no sex, but has the potentiality of manifestation under either sex, is born at one time as a male and at another as a female, in order to acquire the qualities belonging to both sexes. Concerning this doctrine, or, indeed, concerning any soul at all which could, under any circumstances, be thus re-born, this book is altogether silent. In none of the half dozen instances in which the term soul occurs—for in all its 300 pages it does not occur oftener—is the sense that of an entity capable of subsisting apart from the physical organism; but on the contrary, the Sympneuma is explicitly declared to be the "sex-complement, love, spirit, angel, and inspiring soul" of the "real man." This elimination of the soul, in any of the senses commonly understood, is, however, only what, on our hypothesis as to the derivation of the doctrine, was to be expected.

There is another sense, besides that of character, in which man may be regarded as "biune" without lapsing into the Sympneumatic conception. This is in respect of substance or constituent elements. Of this kind of biunity there are two modes. One is when man is composed of matter and spirit, or form and reality, as in his ordinary terrestrial condition. The other is when, having sublimated and indrawn his outer and lower elements, solid and fluid, he consists of two only, soul and spirit, and, transmuting his soul into spirit, has become "neither male nor female, but one creature." This is called the twofold state, and they who attain to it are termed, as in the Apocalypse, "virgin," on account of their exemption from any material admixture, whether solid or fluid. It is the highest state of the soul, and its full attainment involves the complete dissociation from matter in any mode, and the impossibility of reinvestment with a body. In giving a physical and physiological signification to the above-cited utterance ascribed by Clement to Jesus, and to numerous other symbolical expressions, this book ignores all established rules of mystical interpretation, and degrades to a low level that which belongs to a high one.

Not that anything is evil because it is material, however "solid" it may be. "Nor," to cite the words of Hermes to Asclepius, "is man debased because he has a mortal part. On the contrary, this mortality augments his aptitudes and his powers; his double functions are possible to him only by his dual nature; he is constituted so that he can embrace alike the terrestrial and the Divine. . . . Wherefore, while addressing to God his praises and his acts of grace, man should venerate the Kosmos which is the image of God, remembering that he is himself the second image of God; for God has two similitudes, the world and man. . . . and man is composed of a divine part and of a mortal part." (Discourse on Initiation, Bs. V., VI.) The same system, it may be noted, expressly restricts sex and its functions, in their physiological sense, to the material or what Sympneumata calls the "solid" plane,—a doctrine universally accepted, we believe, by "Spiritualists." Wherefore in ascribing them to the superior planes and, instead of deriving man from God mediately through the world, and allowing him to be properly endowed with a terrestrial or "solid" nature, deriving man directly from God and denying to him any proper terrestrial nature (and thereby to the world any possibility of redemption in and through man as its highest product):—this book sets itself in direct opposition to that Divine Gnosis which constituted the esoteric doctrine of all the world's great religious systems. We shall see presently on the strength of what authority it does this: but first a reply in anticipation to a question which will undoubtedly occur to our readers.

(To be concluded next week.)

THE Spiritualist Temple, Boston, has a school for children, small halls for meetings and séances, and accommodation for the reception and treatment of the sick by healing mediums. The large hall is crowded at the services on Sundays.—Le Spiritisme.

THE orthodox hold nothing as to their future, beyond the hope based on the record of the resurrection and ascension of their Lord and Saviour; yet when Spiritualists offer them what one might think congenial testimony and demonstration of a future life, they have nothing for them but ill-names. This ought not to be, surely, because their revelations of a future life do not include the orthodox hell.—REV. G. WALTERS.

Le Spiritisme, which takes notice of what goes on abroad and among us, quotes, as worthy of observation, some recent comments of the Manchester Evening News on the Cumberland-Labouchere challenge. That journal regrets its having fallen through, and thinks that the backing out of the Cumberland-Labouchere party will go to the credit of Mr. Eglinton, whose course it considers, while disclaiming Spiritualism, to have been strictly correct. It expresses regret that Messrs. Labouchere and Lankester could not speak of Spiritualism without applying foul epithets to it and to mediums. It cites some of the published experiments with Mr. Eglinton, and concludes by expressing doubts as to the reality of the anti-Spiritualist convictions of those gentlemen.

The Forthcoming Lecture.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am advertised to deliver an address at the conversazione to be held in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, on Friday evening next, April 24th. Will you permit me to recommend your readers who propose to attend the conversazione, to read with carefulness the accounts of the remarkable séances given in "LIGHT," for February 21st, March 14th and 28th, April 18th, and such subsequent numbers as may contain the reports. My remarks will be based on those séances, which, in my opinion, are unique, and at the close of the address I shall be prepared to reply to any number of relevant questions.—I am, &c.,
Newcastle-on-Tyne,
April 6th, 1885.
T. P. BARRAS.

Mr. J. H. Pollen.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In justice to myself, and those who have confidence in me, I must say I know nothing of the antecedents of Mr. J. H. Pollen.

He has called upon me twice or thrice, and so far is "personally known" to me; that is all.

I would by no means check the generous charity of good Mrs. Everitt that has brought to Mr. Pollen much serviceable aid. But she must know, as I well know, there are a hundred young men able and willing to work who can get no work to do, and are circumstanced precisely as Mr. J. H. Pollen is circumstanced.

He wants and seeks confidential employment: it would therefore be for those who offer it to him to obtain guarantees for the future by inquiry concerning the past.—Yours truly,

A Notice by "Lily."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

"Lily" is extremely sorry that, in answer to "A Spiritualist's" most natural remarks, she is away from home, and will be for a fortnight or three weeks; consequently she has not the necessary references with her.

But in a note-book she has with her she finds it stated that the body weighed 145lb., and that Liebig reduced it to an "impalpable elementary condition." The moment it is possible "Lily" will give further information in "LIGHT."

ORTHODOXY AND MAGNETISM.—Dr. Elliotson and Dr. Ashburner were, forty years ago, lecturers in the medical schools of the University College and Middlesex Hospitals, of which they were also, respectively, physicians. Becoming convinced of the truth of animal magnetism, they introduced it, as a curative agent, to the knowledge of their classes, under the name of mesmerism, after Mesmer. Their colleagues, instead of investigating a subject of importance, so commended to them, for Elliotson and Ashburner were men of acknowledged eminence, denounced the innovation. The orthodox clamour they raised ended in the resignation of their posts. But, bold in their philanthropy and in the truth, they went on teaching mesmerism orally and in print. One result of this was the extensive literature on mesmerism which we have to-day, and the formation of a Mesmeric Infirmary. But there was another result: the medical journals took sides with orthodoxy; they "do the thinking" for general practitioners; and these orthodox journals held up Elliotson and Ashburner as innovators who were no longer safe to be consulted. Their practice then rapidly fell away, until the orthodox were satisfied by seeing these eminent physicians starved, figuratively speaking, out of their large houses, once so thronged with fee-paying patients. Dr. Elliotson, in poverty, was hospitably received by his friend Dr. Sims, under whose roof he died. Dr. Ashburner, under the same circumstances, shared in his wife's income, happily not too limited. He died, between eighty and ninety, near London, a few years ago. Both Dr. Elliotson and Dr. Ashburner were Spiritualists before they departed this life, recognising that Spiritualism and Spiritualists have to pass through the same orthodox furnace as mesmerism and mesmerists had done.

VILIFICATION OF MEDIUMS.

All mediums who receive payment for the use of their faculty, and those also who do not, so far as we know, have been objects of vilification, originating, usually, with those who assume that there are no spirits, and, therefore, that mediums are either tricksters or victims of a delusion.

Dr. Chazaraïn's reports of sêances with Madame Bablin, of Paris, will be remembered by the readers of "LIGHT." This medium has had her share of vilification. Last year she was invited to give a series of sêances at Brussels. She went, and manifestations were witnessed with satisfaction by a circle, or groupe, of inquirers. At her seventeenth sêance, among the introduced visitors were some who came not to inquire: they were of those who have concluded beforehand that there is nothing at a spiritualist sêance to inquire into but trickery and dupery. The account they wrote of their visit was a welcome contribution to a Brussels newspaper, and it became one of the stock misrepresentations of Spiritualism in Belgium. Lately returning to the subject it named, among some of the so-called dupes at the sêance in question, M. Boyard, an investigator and a scientific chemist, who thought it well to address a letter to the editor on the subject, in which he exposed the fallacies of the "exposers." As usual, with such letters, it was not inserted; he, therefore, sent a copy to the Revue Spirite, and it appears in its number for March. Such cases being of general interest we give a translation of the main points of M. Boyard's letter. He says:—

"On the publication of the so-called 'exposure,' I deliberated as to how psychical phenomena might be witnessed without the possibility of the medium participating, consciously or unconsciously, in their production; and I concluded that the case would be met if she were isolated in a wire cage. I proposed this to Madame Bablin, and she consented at once. So I caused one to be made, through any part of which she could not pass more than a finger. If phenomena occurred with her enclosed in such a cage, they must manifestly be due to forces not her own; and her part in their manifestation could be due solely to her passive presence as a medium.

"At our first sêance, the medium being seated in this cage, doubly padlocked, with the room darkened as previously, the phenomena were feeble, not to our surprise, considering her shaken nervous health and the newness of the conditions; but the hands of sitters, among them my own, were grasped in the same manner as at previous sêances when the medium sat bound in her chair.

"At succeeding sêances the phenomena manifested increasing power and facility; there were apports of flowers, direct writings, the floating of a musical-box over our heads while playing, and the passage of the medium's jacket through the cage, the diameter of the openings of its meshes being from two to three centimetres: an instance of matter passing through matter, of which Zöllner and others have recorded similar occurrences. Of this phenomenon the apports furnished other instances.

"The question of Madame Bablin's mediumship being thus settled beyond dispute, we could readily admit the possibility of other psychical phenomena, which the impaired state of her health forbade us looking for, such as the manifestation of materialised spirit forms, which we had previously witnessed; the incompatibility of such manifestations with the conceptions of materialists notwithstanding.

"From our present standpoint, are we able to account for the facts of the so-called 'exposure'? Yes, by the rational assumption that the articles 'exposed' upon the passive medium were apports. Do you say that this is impossible? Then let me ask you to explain the passing of the medium's jacket from her arms and shoulders through the cage.

"Let me now draw attention to other facts which were not attempted to be 'exposed'—hands passing with lightning velocity from one side of the groupe to the opposite; touching sitters on any spot asked for with unerring precision, implying the accurate vision of the agent touching. I have yet to learn that anyone in the body can exercise accurate vision in darkness. Then the lights, visible to all, rising and falling, coming and going enlarging and diminishing in size and intensity, lights impossible to imitate by any chemical process. In your paper the sulphuret of calcium was suggested as having been possibly employed, by some impossible means not suggested; but that sulphuret requires re-exposure to light for reviving its luminosity, lost gradually by exposure in darkness; and I have yet to learn how the sudden reviving of such luminosity could be effected in darkness.

"Spiritualists have, as well as materialists, much to learn on the subject of psychical phenomena, but to learn we have all to observe and study.—AUGUSTIN BOYARD.

MR. EGLINTON desires 'us to announce that he has removed to 6, Nottingham-place, W. (near Baker-street Station). He will not, however, be in a position to resume his sêances until after the 23rd inst.

GERMANY.—We have received a Post Office Order from Germany, but no advice accompanied it. We are, therefore, unable either to acknowledge its receipt or to credit the account of the subscriber by whom it was sent with the amount.

MR. E. WOOTON, of 10, Westbourne-terrace North, Westbourne-square, W., writes:—I am desirous of forming an inquiry circle. Will those of your readers residing in my neighbourhood who would like to join in my labours kindly let me hear by letter?

MRS. RICHMOND.—We are informed that the committee who acted for Mrs. Richmond during her visit last year have invited her to repeat her visit to London in May and June, and resume the series of discourses given at the Kensington Town Hall on Sunday evenings.

"LILY" will feel obliged to the editor of "LIGHT" if he will allow her in his columns to thank those Spiritualists who have addressed to her their kind appreciation of any little efforts she has made in furtherance of their noble and holy faith; and she deeply regrets her inability to thank by a personal letter the kind writers.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—The next conversation of the Alliance will be held on Friday, April 24th, in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, when Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, will deliver an address, his subject being "There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." We hope members and friends will make a point of being present.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.* VI.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

The fact that the word "matter" has been almost exclusively applied to "solids," or to those substances which are visible to the common eye, or can be demonstrated as existing by means of the microscope, has given rise to an endless confusion of thought. To limit the solidity of matter would be to determine the limits of "spirit," as far as the latter is a conceivable "something." When, for instance, we speak of matter as being composed of corpuscles, particles, or atoms, united together, we are merely using generally adopted terms for objects or principles, the actual existence of which remains still to be proven; and which are, in fact, mere hypothetical necessities for getting out of a difficulty. The luminiferous ether, for instance, is (as a medium for transmission of force) material. The speculations of metaphysicians and astronomers are not incompatible with the records of observations of spiritualistic facts that have come under our notice. To quote one or two: Laplace, in his theory of the origin of our solar—and all other—systems, presupposes a fluidic substance as representing space, and the contractions of this substance to nebule, &c. Flammarion (the celebrated astronomer and Kardechian Spiritist) remarks, that "if a quantity of solid matter, be it only the size of a pea, may, or can, be obtained out of millions of cubic miles of this universal ether—say if it can be imagined to be represented in this ether—the existence of all the worlds in the universe, no matter what their masses might be, is accounted for, since space is infinite."

But to return to the solution of the drapery problem. We are now compelled to refer to that particular phenomenon which cannot be produced at will, which has, as yet, not been demonstrated by photography, but which has, none the less, been observed and recorded from the earliest ages of man's existence. I refer to the traditional (not the conventional) ghost, i.e., the veridical phantom. In these various apparitions, with a few exceptions, however, the phantom is seen to wear the garments or clothing in which it was last, or usually, attired. I, when a boy, met with a similar occurrence, viz., the phantom of a gardener standing at my side, disappearing suddenly, and re-appearing at some distance in front of me. Not only were the clothes exactly like those worn by that class of people, but there was a bit of old clay pipe sticking in a button-hole of its coat! Amongst the multitudinous cases of apparitions recorded by the Society for Psychical Research, many are of a somewhat analogous nature, and I do not see any extravagance in the assertion that these strange occurrences are absolute realities, which one day or other will be generally established as such. To account for the presence of the wearing apparel in the above quoted cases, we must again refer to the often demonstrated truth that, between the living being and the objects in constant juxtaposition with the body, there exists a certain rapport or "magnetic" connection. It appears that inorganic matter absorbs, or becomes impregnated with, certain qualities or properties inherent—self-existent—in the organic, i.e., the living being.

Probably this "magnetism" is not a force radiating or emanating from the body but a spiritual substance or fluid permeating the body and its surroundings, which, when connected with the inorganic substance, causes a certain alteration in its nature or develops certain properties in its constituents. Hence, if this union, or rapport, be once established, it adheres to, and becomes identical with, the death-resisting principle in man, and again becomes the spiritual property to spiritual man. To the latter it would consequently appear "natural," and like a still more attenuated condition of matter, would have a proportionately similar value to beings of a still higher and more spiritual stage of existence (like those seen in the photographs). It is evident from oft-repeated experiments that "spirits" possess additional powers over matter; that, also, this spiritual property can be made to again re-assume the solid phase, when brought into fresh contact with what is generally termed the physical medium. By what process, we shall, perhaps, never be able to fully comprehend, since its evolution is dependent upon faculties which belong to another stage of existence. We merely witness the result, and draw deductions, to the best of our ability. Nor can we reasonably expect the manifesting spirits to give us more detailed instruction about the real nature of either spirit or matter, or about their—to us—superior faculties, because they do not understand their powers any more than we do ours. Still, they do, occasionally, give us valuable information, which may, perhaps, at some future time, when our knowledge has sufficiently increased, supply the key to many of the mysteries which now perplex us.

Although the strange reality of "dressed ghosts" is explainable by the hypothesis of magnetic rapport, we are still in the dark as regards the origin of the larger sheets of calico worn by "spirits" appearing in sêance-rooms, and which are certainly not duplicates of the original garments worn by them in earth-life. I am almost certain that in nearly all cases, this particular original or "spiritual counterpart" must be looked for in the medium's immediate surroundings, not to mention the frequent instances when ordinary sheets, cloaks, pocket-handkerchiefs, &c., are directly borrowed for the occasion when a chance is afforded to this class of "spirits." The medium may be cognisant or ignorant of this fact—the question is of no great importance—nor would it be fair to hold any medium responsible for actions over which he or she has no direct control. There would, besides, be no actual harm done by abstracting the essential basis of some sheets of calico in the medium's house or bedroom. I am positively certain that out of a material of thick texture, spirits can, by manipulation, change that texture into a ten-fold quantity of gauze-like substance. This I have seen to occur under my own eyes. If spirits can alter the texture of a substance, and, if a fundamental spiritual counterpart can be explained by the rapport theory, the appearance and subsequent disappearance of the drapery presents nothing absolutely miraculous. In the spiritual beings represented in the photographs, a very similar process is likely to be followed, and to all appearance the same conditions are observed, viz., there is an original "natural" spiritual garment preserved by magnetic contact during life, which is retained or re-assumed; or the "sitter" for the portraits acts to these spirits as a physical medium; the "contact" with the person sitting supplying the power or magnetic fluid required for its further development into visible (photographically-reproducible) drapery.

In the remarkable case recorded in "LIGHT," where a form was seen to build up from underneath masses of a dingy white-looking substance drawn by the medium from underneath his morning coat, it appears that the spiritual counterpart must have been stored there for development, by the spirit so materialising. I have it from two of the sitters that spirit-forms (in the vaporous, phantom-like state) had been previously noticed to move near the medium's person. The question is how far the medium was conscious of personally assisting in the manifestation. Probably he was under the absolute control of the "spirit" present, and was only automatically carrying out a process of usual occurrence, but which on that occasion seemed a novelty on account of the materialisation happening in the light. For when, as is the rule, the same manifestations occur in the dark, there is no means of ascertaining what actually takes place. The lights which were noticed to flutter all over his breast (a circumstance which I had previously noticed with the same, and also with other mediums) appear to be the "magnetic fluid" which serves as the constructive power in these manifestations.

It should also be well borne in mind that there is no direct necessity for a "spirit" to get possession of a spiritual counterpart by entering himself in contact, or by having previously—i.e., in earth-life—been in contact with the garments in which they now appear; it seems sufficient when the medium has done so. The spirits can—so they confess to me—sever that essential counterpart during their medium's sleep and solidify it afterwards, through his magnetism, out of the elements present in his surroundings (which in plain language would mean: we take it from his bedclothes).

THE CONDITIONS OF SUCCESS IN SPIRITUAL INVESTIGATION.

By S. E. DE M.

The excellent observations of Mr. Carleton Massey on failure and success in experiments on spiritual phenomena have induced me to offer a few additional suggestions on the subject. I trust that its importance, and the obscurity in which it is involved, will save me from the charge of presumption.

My experience in this matter was gained, for much the most part, in the absence of any professional medium; but in saying this I have not the slightest intention to depreciate those men and women who have given their services to enable scientific men to establish facts of the highest value, and who certainly could not bestow their time, and as I believe, bodily strength, for the purpose, without any return.

In the very simple and unpretending circles in which I learned what little I know of spiritual phenomena it soon became apparent that those friends who obtained the most convincing and unquestionable proofs were found to possess strong "mediumistic" (the word under protest) powers in their own persons. And, on the other hand, inquirers who contributed most power to the circle were often those who had, in the first instance, retarded or even prevented the occurrence of the phenomena, until the assurance of some one whom they held in respect, or some slight indication of a movement or a sound, excited their interest and overcame their incredulity. In one such case the presence of a large-brained, intellectual man, not opposed to the facts, but sceptical, in spite of himself, as to their possibility, retarded the occurrence of the "manifestation" for twenty minutes or more. He left the room and they began at once, the "spirits" saying by raps that he had "unconsciously repelled" them. On his return he obtained communications on subjects known to none of the party but himself, two of which involved details either not known to, or not remembered by, him. After this his own mediumship became apparent.

After this time repeated experience led me to believe that just in the degree in which the inquirer possesses the faculty known as mediumship, will the trusting person help, and the suspicious or sceptical one hinder, the occurrence of phenomena. This was repeatedly proved in the early times to which I refer, now thirty years ago, when some of those whose presence at first delayed, but afterwards greatly strengthened the manifestations, became themselves strong mediums, and had a place among the "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation."

We all found that to engage in this inquiry with the object of detecting fraud was almost always either fatal to success or a great obstacle to it. To devise tests is not the way to obtain proofs. But, as I have heard such men as Dr. Robert Chambers, Professor Gregory, and others remark, "If you prescribe a test you will not get it, but if you wait and take what comes, proof in abundance will be given you." This is all in accordance with the assertions of the "spirits" that "the intelligence at the other end of the wire," the sender of the message, passes a current of "spiritual fluid" through the medium, whose capacity varies with his passion and with the character of his mind, or its material organ—his brain. The existence and operation of this "spiritual fluid" are rendered probable by the experiments of Reichenbach, Gregory, and others, and receive some amount of confirmation from the statements of clairvoyants, and of the early patients of Mesmer, Deleuze, Puységur, and the first mesmerisers.

I believe that most intellectual men and women have, in one direction or another, the receptive and transmissive capacity called mediumship; but their minds are cultivated, active, and generally disciplined in the direction which would lead them to look for physical causes alone in explanation of the phenomena. Hence they themselves, by repelling the current, probably fail in supplying the fit apparatus for the working of that power which finds a ready instrument in the passive and perhaps credulous mind.

Many scientific and thoughtful men are now engaged in psychical research, and it is not unlikely that in their experiments the apparatus offered to the unseen worker may often prove rather a hindrance than a help to his operations. At any rate the question is worth considering in discussing conditions of success or causes of failure.

There are two verses of the Gospel narrative which imply that the conditions now found to contribute to failure or success were also required in that great outpouring of the Spirit described by the Evangelists:—

"He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief."

And, before the wonderful manifestation at Pentecost, "They were all with one accord in one place."

AN advertisement will be found on our front page of the re-issue of several standard works which have, for some time, been either out of print, or otherwise unobtainable.

WE regret to announce the passing away, at Abu Fatmeh, on April 8th, of Colonel Primrose, brother of Lord Rosebery. The deceased officer had been a Spiritualist for many years past, but we believe the last séance he attended was with Mr. Eglinton at Vienna some years ago. He was military attaché at Vienna, and recently proceeded to Egypt on Lord Wolseley's staff.

IN France, many contributors to the spiritist journals are retired officers. Dr. Wahu, officer of the Legion of Honour, army physician, is one of them. He brought out, last year, a volume entitled "Consolations et Enseignements," and this year one of 780 pages, "Spiritisme dans l'Antiquité et dans les Temps Modernes."

AT Pesth there is on one of the quays a lofty house which has the aspect of a prison. The licensed guides always point out this dismal-looking house to visitors to the city as having a story, reminding us of that of the sentry box in which soldier after soldier committed suicide, and which was destroyed by order of Napoleon I. The story is this: Some years ago one of the inmates of the house committed suicide by throwing himself from one of the windows. The example was followed by another; and then by several others. The landlord began to feel prompted to do the same, so, before the impulse became too strong, he sent for workmen and had every window effectually barred against any such event to him or to anyone else in the future.—Revue Spirite.

IMPROMPTU REPLIES THROUGH A LADY PSYCHIC OF VERY LIMITED EDUCATION.

IV.

By T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

Séance held August 30th, 1875. Present, two ladies and eight gentlemen.

Among the gentlemen at the séance was a learned professor of music, whom I took with me for the purpose of asking musical questions, to which a person with an ordinary knowledge of music would not be able to reply in an appreciative manner, without special preparation. The questions, in the order in which they appear, were asked by the professor of music were written by me in the manuscript book and read aloud, and were very rapidly replied to in writing by the hand of the lady medium. The following is a verbatim copy of the questions and answers in the order in which they were given. Whether they are right or wrong I am unable to say, but they are certainly appreciative answers to difficult questions, and probably could not, under similar circumstances, be given so well by one musician in five thousand. I have not yet met with a musician who can answer them so well in an impromptu manner, and with very few who profess fully to understand them now that they are answered:—

Q. Will you please to say how the ratio between specific beats (I was not quite certain of the word, but I caught it as "beats," and wrote it so) of air for constant volume and constant pressure may be calculated from the observed velocity of sound, and the velocity as calculated by Sir Isaac Newton's formula?

A. The ratio can only be calculated in this manner. Suppose two chords to be struck, or two forks tuned at the same time; if the intensity of the sound be the same, or nearly the same, the beats will occur in this manner: Suppose one pulsation beats at the rate of 228 per second and the other at 220, the beats will reach the ear at the rate of $228 - 220 = 8$ per second; this will give you eight beats per second, and is the utmost that can be carried to the ear.

Q. Will you please to put bass to the accompanying melody which has just been written and read by Mr. — (the professional musician)?

A. I am no composer and scarcely understand your English music. I should not improve on you, were I to attempt it, so decline.

Q. Will you please to give us an explanation of the cause of beats of imperfect concords?

A. This question belongs to acoustics proper. A beat or pulsation is caused by a sound-wave, and many sounds produce many waves. The sounds issuing from one part of a room fill the air in proximity to them, and the waves interfere with each other, thus producing imperfect beats or imperfect pulsations, and do not reach the ear in isochronous vibrations.

Q. When a musical note is vibrating at 300 per second, and another at 200 per second, they produce a fifth. If the note which was sounded at 200 be raised to 201, at what number will the beat occur for the first time?

A. At exactly the same number as in the first case, but a beat over the original number would be sounded, but that beat would be one octave lower than the first ones.

Q. What is a major tone, what is a minor, and what is a Limma?

A. I never heard of the word you last mention, but of the major and minor we generally, in German music, take as the fundamental. . . . (Here the MS. is illegible.)

in striking the H we get the major tone, and in the B the minor; but I am rather at a loss, for I have always studied the German music, and our notes are differently named. Please to explain to me the names of your English ones?

Here the musical professor present verbally explained the names of the English notes, and asked the following question:—

Q. Will you kindly tell us whether C to D in the scale of C is a major tone or a minor tone, and also if D to E is the same interval as C to D, that is, is the latter a major or a minor tone?

A. From C to D is a major tone, and from D to E is what you would call a minor, but in reality, the beats not occurring at the same time, it is neither a major nor a minor, but one for which we have no name.

Q. Will you please to re-write between the words "fundamental and H," in the preceding answer, the MS. being nearly illegible?

A. By major we understand the fundamental sound and by minor the complementary sound, slightly differing in tone to the major, but being of the same intensity.

Q. What is the difference between a diatonic semitone and a chromatic semitone?

A. I am not quite sure I understand the question, at least I do not understand the terms you use.

Q. What is meant by enharmonic diesis?

A. When two or more sounds are given, the waves carry the sound, and the waves impinging one on the other cause a disturbance, and the reflected waves carrying on the disturbance cause the diesis.

Q. Will you please to inform us what is meant by a comma?

A. That cessation of all sound caused by the coincidence and interference of the sound waves.

Q. Will you please to inform us what is the difference between C sharp and D flat, or, as I believe they are called in German, but of this I am not certain, Cis and Des?

A. C sharp belongs to one diapason, and D flat to another.

Q. Would you kindly tell us the difference between E natural and F flat, and between E sharp and F natural?

A. The same answer as under (above) applies to this question. E natural and F sharp are in the same diapason, but F flat and E sharp are not.

Q. Please to re-write the above answer, as the question is, What is the difference between E natural and F flat, and between E sharp and F natural?

A. The F flat is of course a semitone above the E natural, but is not in the same diapason. Substitute flat for sharp in the above answer and it will be found correct.

Q. Please to inform us if you understand that a violin has four strings tuned at intervals of one-fifth from each other, as we desire to ask some questions that will require that knowledge on your part?

A. All I know of violins is that they are stringed instruments, and that different notes are formed by shortening or damping the strings. This is the sum total of my practical knowledge of that instrument.

Q. If we ascend by four perfect fifths, and descend by a major third and two perfect octaves, do we arrive at exactly the same point, and, if not, what is the difference?

A. I believe you arrive at exactly the same point, but let the question stand over; I am not quite clear.

Q. Oblige by answering the following question: Starting from C, and ascending by two major thirds, and descending a perfect fifth, on what note do we arrive?

A. This is almost the same question reversed, but I think if you start from C and ascend two major thirds, and descend one-fifth, you will arrive at Des sharp, but I am not at all certain. I am better acquainted with the theories of music than the practice.

Q. Please to say what the word or letter is that precedes sharp?

A. I wrote Des, but I mean D.

Q. If by ascending one octave, and descending a major third and perfect fifth, shall we arrive at the same note as in the last question, and if not what is the difference?

A. At D natural.

Q. The lowest string of a violin is G; the next is D, which is a perfect fifth above G; the next A, which is a perfect fifth above D; and the next is E, which is a perfect fifth above A, so that the strings of a violin form three perfect fifths. Will G, produced upon the E string, which is the highest string, and which will form a minor third to E, will this G be exactly two octaves above G of the first string, and if not what is the difference?

A. It will give the same note as G on the lower string, but two octaves higher, and of a higher rate. Thus, if I mistake not, the E string must have a node formed at one half, and the diameter being half that of the G or lower string—(MS. illegible.) note, judging by this rule, (MS. again illegible) $\frac{1}{2}$ length 2-rate higher pitch, $\frac{1}{2}$ diameter 2-rate higher, 4 times diameter $\frac{1}{2}$ -rate lower pitch.

Q. Will you please to re-write the above answer from the E string?

A. The E string will have a node formed by damping it at one half to produce the G, thus giving the same note as the G string, but two octaves higher and of a higher rate. Judging by this rule in stringed instruments $\frac{1}{2}$ length 2 rate higher pitch, 2 length $\frac{1}{2}$ rate lower pitch, $\frac{1}{2}$ diameter $\frac{1}{2}$ rate higher pitch, 4 times diameter $\frac{1}{2}$ rate lower pitch.

Q. A string which is eight feet long is, as you very well know, just an octave below one that is four feet, and ceteris paribus. In the same way a pipe eight feet long is an octave below one four feet in length. Will a tongue one inch in length be an octave higher than one two inches long? Are the vibrations in inverse proportion to the length of the tongue?

A. This is well known that it is inversely proportional to the length of the reed, but specify the particular pipes you inquire about, Cremona, hautboy, or oboe; vox humana, cornet, or trumpet?

Q. Will the same law hold good with all reeds, and if such is not the case will you please to name some reeds in which the law does hold, and others in which it does not?

A. It would not hold good in the vox humana and Cremona, but in the hautboy, cornet, and trumpet it would. I will get up my knowledge of these subjects, and will, perhaps, be able to speak plainer and give you some instruction if you desire it.

Q. Please to say if a one-inch reed will give a tone an octave higher than a two-inch reed?

A. I am not quite sure whether or not the sound is inversely proportioned to the square root of the reed; that is what I want to get at.

Q. Will you please to inform us whether notes of different pitch and intensity travel through the air with equal rapidity, and if not whether the higher or lower notes travel more swiftly?

A. High notes travel much more quickly than grave ones, as the intensity of the note depends on the amplitude of vibrations of air particles. The higher the note or the greater the force with which it is struck, sends it more rapidly through space, but a grave note and a higher one struck at the same time, the grave one will be heard first, and after that has ceased to sound, the high one will still be perfectly audible, thus proving that the high note will travel faster than the low one. The sound is done first, but the reflected wave is quite as audible as the original one.

Q. If high and low notes, intense notes, and those that are not so, travel at different rates, how is it that an auditor, standing at a considerable distance from the orchestra or band, hears the music in the same manner as he would hear were he standing very much nearer?

A. The intensity of a sound has nothing to do with the pitch of any instrument, and it depends on the elasticity of the temperature which sound first reaches the ear; but there is no perceptible difference in a large orchestra. But to take two instruments together, you will find the difference. An organ and a violin, for example; you will invariably find you hear the acute note of the violin before the grave one of the organ, and vice versa.

Q. You mentioned the name of Meyerbeer and one or two other composers in a previous communication. Will you please to inform us who the others are, and if you are acquainted with them in your present state, or made their acquaintance in the present world?

A. I knew the composer of "Les Huguenots," but have not seen anything of him here. I have seen Weber and Handel since coming here, but have not frequently come in contact with them.

Q. Please to say if you are willing or able to get an interview with Handel or Weber before Monday evening next, or any other time you please to appoint, as we are desirous of asking questions having relation to their musical works?

A. I am quite willing, but I question my ability. I will do my best.

Q. We are very glad to have had so pleasant and instructive a conversation with you this evening on the subject of music and musical instruments, and we shall be glad to know if it be your wish to continue this subject next Monday evening, or take the other subject which you suggested last week instead of it, viz., optics?

A. I would rather continue this subject, but if I am unable to prepare myself by that time, we will take the dioptics, if it suit you to be prepared with both.

With the exception of the last question, all the questions were asked by my musical friend, who only attended this and the next sances of the series, and was personally unacquainted with the medium and the visitors present. No such thing, therefore, as collusion or preparation is probable.

(To be concluded next week.)

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

WALWORTH SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION (43, Manor-place, Walworth).—On Sunday evening, April 12th, Mr. James Veitch spoke on the subject of "Spiritualism: Constructive and Destructive." He showed that the destructive portion of Spiritualism lay in its powerful array of constructive facts, in that these facts opened up a new idea of life beyond the grave; an idea that was also more in accordance with humanising principles than the old-fashioned view of immortality, which he was happy to see was losing its hold upon the minds of the people. On Sunday evening next Miss Young will speak. It is expected that a large audience will be present to hear this gifted medium.

BIRMINGHAM.—Miss Allen, of Edgbaston, gave an earnest address upon "Faith," at Oozells-street, on Sunday night (March 29th). She was listened to most attentively as she vividly depicted the beauty and power of faith, saying, "The world would change its whole aspect if faith, instead of unbelief, abounded." She spoke of the healing through faith she herself had witnessed, of the power of faith to purify the character, and to bestow courage, energy, and joy; adding, "We as Spiritualists can believe that Christ, Who did such wonderful works when on earth, has now in His fuller, celestial life, not less, but more, power and more love; therefore, His desire must be to help and save to the uttermost those who call upon Him." It was the teaching that is so greatly needed, and many regretted that the inclemency of the weather had prevented a large number attending.—The previous Sunday Miss Allen had spoken to appreciative audiences at Belper in Derbyshire, the morning subject being, "Thoughts upon Christ," and the evening one, "The Importance of Work."—Miss Rosamond Dale Owen occupied the platform at Oozells-street last Sunday, April 12th. In the morning it was a conversational meeting of a most interesting character; questions were asked which Miss Owen answered most ably. In the evening she gave a beautiful address upon "Experimental Proofs of a Hereafter," after which questions were again asked and answered, and great interest was excited. Miss Owen delighted all by her wise, quiet manner and clear, concise style. As she gave her own remarkable experiences in physical manifestations there was much to startle the inexperienced, but her simple, natural way of relating these phenomena convinced the most sceptical of her sincerity. If there were more such speakers Spiritualists would rapidly multiply. It is greatly to be deplored that through the bigotry of a few such an able exponent of the cause should be silenced.—F.E.

GLASGOW.—Sunday, April 12th.—At the morning and evening services the guides of Mrs. Wallis ministered to the needs of both occasions. The subject of the brief address in the forenoon was "The Sunshine of Life," the delivery of which was followed by conversation and clairvoyant descriptions of spirit friends by "Vena"; these descriptions were generally recognised. The evening's discourse treated of "Practical Thoughts for Daily Life." The audience was full, and the delivery was fluent, vigorous, and well sustained. The main contentions were that pain is an educator; religion a practical consideration which makes every day a sacred sabbath for good motives, words, and deeds to prevail; that the evils which abound in domestic, social, and national life are largely traceable to the lack of the elements of confidence and faithfulness, first of all in the individual, then in the family of which he is a member, and so on throughout the entire body corporate of humanity; and, finally, that man is not wholly a creature of circumstances, but can and must be a creator of them. Such themes afforded the guides ample scope for earnest appeal to the spiritual apprehension of the individual listener, and for solemn exhortation to higher and nobler effort to achieve the practical goodness which these "practical thoughts" suggested.—The district meeting this week is for the Northern Division, and will be held on Wednesday evening, at eight o'clock, in the house of Mr. Griffin, 61, Tennent-street; and next week (Western Division), on Wednesday, 22nd inst., at the same hour, at Mr. Gemmell's, 17, Elderslie-street. A cordial invitation is extended to all Spiritualists and inquirers in the respective neighbourhoods. The usual Tuesday meetings in the hall are continued. Next Sunday Mrs. Wallis will again occupy the platform.—Sr. Mungoo.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

O. MURRAY.—Notice is inserted.

J. E. F.—Thanks. We have sent for the book.

W. LOWENTHAL.—Thanks. Will appear.

R. P. JOURNAL.—"The Perfect Way" is out of print.

R. WOLSTENHOLME.—Thanks. Will be used in due course.

N. C.—MSS. returned. We have already dealt with the matter.

MRS. S. P. ATKINSON.—We will try and give a place to your letter next week.

J. G. KEULEMANS.—Tickets have been sent. Kindly send other information if you get it.

"SIDNEY SHORT."—MSS. returned as requested. Do not forget to let us know when you come to town.

JAMES VEITCH.—We are glad to comply with your request. Cannot you introduce "LIGHT" at your meetings?

G. D. HAUGHTON.—"Lily" has asked us to draw your attention to a paragraph notice from her in this issue of "LIGHT."

H. W. S. K.—You cannot do better than consult Mr. Eglinton. He will be in his new quarters by the 24th inst. In the meantime you can address a letter for an appointment to our care.

MISS GLYNN.—Parts IV., V., and VI. of Gregory's "Animal Magnetism" are sent you as requested. Thanks for your kind words about the chronos.

W. CAMPBELL.—Cut the white margin off altogether, and mount them on cardboard with a margin sufficient for your purpose. This is what we have done. Glad you like the plates.

E. MAITLAND.—A copy of "LIGHT" containing the review you mention has now been sent you. We had not one in stock when your card arrived, and had to obtain one for you from a friend.

JOHN THOMAS.—You cannot have a better instruction book than Gregory's "Private Instructions," by Miss Hunt, price, one guinea, is also good, and, perhaps, would answer your purpose.

G. A. KING.—Your MS. has not yet been read. We will peruse it shortly and let you know. Communications such as yours have to take their turn. It will receive careful attention in due course.

F. EVERITT.—Both notices appear this week. In making up last week we had, at the last moment, to omit your report, and the necessity for alteration of the "answer" intended for you escaped us.

T. H. PATTINSON.—Babbitt's "Wonders of Light and Colour," though written by a Spiritualist, cannot be called a Spiritualistic book. It deals rather with new readings of the subjects with which it deals.

W. H. TERRY.—Your letter of February 5th is just to hand. Many thanks for file of Harbinger. They have not yet come to hand, but will doubtless do so shortly. Your order is being sent this week through Trübner.

G. TOMMY.—Your letter has now been attended to. Your previous communication had got mislaid, and only turned up after prolonged search, for which it was difficult to find time. Please accept our apologies.

MRS. J. K. S.—We fear we have overlooked your request, but now rectify it as soon as discovered. If we can be of any further service we beg you not to hesitate to write again. We will then try and make some atonement.

H. VANDERYSE.—Thanks. We shall be glad to use the engraving you name. Will you send it to us?

J. DIXON.—Your verbal message came duly to hand. But cannot you allow us perfect freedom of action? As you know, we have not only to take into account the question of space, but also to give, if possible, a varied bill of fare.

H. WOOD.—What has been your experience since you last wrote us? We will give you an introduction to Mr. Eglinton now that he has returned to town. We should like to know whether you have had better success or not.

C. CAMPBELL.—Your idea as to an "Inquirers' Column" is a good one, but it requires a little careful organisation. It will come, no doubt, in time, like other improvements we have in view, but which we cannot find opportunities for developing.

J. WHYMARK.—Book sent as requested. It will be best not to publish reports of the affair you mention until fuller information is obtained. When this is possible will you send us a complete file of newspaper cuttings dealing with the matter?

J. H. GLEDSTANES.—Thanks for extract from "Eothen." Your French postal rules evidently do not admit of matter intended for publication going through the post at the book-post rate, as we had to pay a surcharge of 3d., it being treated as a letter.

G. A. JONES, S.E., "M.D." S. LARGE, AND OTHERS.—The secretary of the London Spiritualist Alliance, will, no doubt, be able to help you out of your difficulties by advice, &c. We would gladly do so, but cannot. See notice in last week's "LIGHT."

F. G. S.—The "Woman's Book" has been out of print for a long time, and it was in this sense that we answered your inquiry. If you had applied for chronos before the 31st January last, in accordance with the announcement, there would have been no charge for them.

H. WILSON (Napier).—You do us great service in advertising "LIGHT." But you make a mistake in the subscription. The rate for New Zealand is 13s. per annum. You have sent 4d. short in your remittance for "LIGHT," and 8d. short on book account. The books have been sent to the address named.

MR. RUMBLE.—We will give you an appointment as soon as we can find time. At present we have no opportunity. If you have another chance of circulating "LIGHT" let us know in better time, and we will send you a parcel for distribution. You need not apologise in the way you do. We are glad to utilise the services of all who are willing to work for Spiritualism.

E. G. ARMSTRONG (Brussels).—Your order came to hand on Saturday after the office was closed; we, therefore, received it on Monday morning. It was then executed, and a card sent to the address you gave. Your last communication crossed the postcard. Have you since received it? If not, we will send you the particulars again.

W. J. BATT.—We do not desire that you should suffer through your agent's negligence. As a matter of fact, we sent a special letter to him saying that if he would give us the necessary particulars we would send him the number he required by special messenger. He refused, and, of course, we could do nothing in the matter. We send you a set herewith.

W. RIDDELL.—(1) There is no mystery in the method of witnessing spiritual phenomena. (2) Why not develop a photographic plate in the blazing sunlight? You would do well to read such books as "Psychography," "Animal Magnetism," Crookes' "Researches," Wallace's "Modern Spiritualism," "Bringing it to Book," and others. Write again if necessary.

HENSLEIGH WEDGWOOD.—Your communication, dealing as it does with a matter that appears in a private journal of the society of which you are a vice-president, is for that reason inadmissible to the columns of "LIGHT." We regret that this should be the case, as (we have not the slightest doubt unintentionally) a bar is placed on free discussion of some questions which are very important.

W. GORDON MACKAY.—Your name is entered as a subscriber to "Present Day Problems." You need not send the money until an application is made for it. We are not aware of any work which deals exclusively with "Presentiments," but scattered through the literature of Spiritualism there are many references to, and illustrations of, the subject. Gregory's "Animal Magnetism," perhaps, would be as useful a book as any other; or Owen's "Footfalls"; also "The Debateable Land" by the same author. Write again, if necessary.

DR. BEAUMONT.—Mr. Labouchere's allegations against Dr. Slade were partially true, but the former omitted to state some very important facts. You will find a true account of the occurrence in "LIGHT" during 1882, a copy of which we will try to send you. The so-called "confession" was extracted from Slade under pressure of a threat of criminal proceedings, and not on account of his having been caught fraudulently producing the phenomena. However, you will see the full story if we can find a copy of the number of "LIGHT" in question to send you.

E. G.—We have done as requested, but you will now, we feel assured, appreciate the difficulties we experience in this matter. Of course when quotations are made and the source acknowledged, we can, and will, do what is right in the matter, but should communications in "LIGHT" occasionally contain unacknowledged extracts from the magazine, you must please hold us harmless, as even by courtesy we are not favoured with a copy. When members of your council and a vice-president unwillingly transgress the strict etiquette of the question, less responsible members of the Society can hardly be expected to keep the law. It is, however, a great pity that the report with which you deal in your present letter cannot be fully discussed in an open journal. Are your rules like those of the Medes and Persians?

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Mengens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 1877."

"MATTER THROUGH MATTER" AND MR. MASKELYNE. By G. WYLD, M.D.

The continuous correspondence about my iron ring, which has now been on Mr. Husk's wrist nearly twelve weeks, and has been interviewed by many hundred investigators, is amusing as well as instructive.

This correspondence has the great advantage of keeping the subject of "Matter through Matter" before the public, and of drawing attention to a fact, I believe unique in the history of Spiritualism, namely, an instance of the permanent manifestation of this order of phenomena; for iron rings so placed are generally removed from the medium's wrist in a few minutes or hours. A séance may afford Spiritualistic evidence to the few persons present, but in the instance of this ring the persistency of the phenomenon affords an opportunity of investigation to thousands.

I have always maintained that any man or woman of ordinary capacity, and especially anyone having an eye, hand, or judgment trained by mechanical manipulation, would at once say that this ring could not possibly be got over Mr. Husk's hand without serious injury.

Mr. Maskelyne, in "LIGHT," 18th April, says that it would be "in its present form a very painful if not impossible operation to get it over the hand; but whether by well soaking the hand in hot water, and bending the ring into a pear shape, it could be got on, is a question rather for a surgeon than a mechanician." He also says, "I cannot admit that in my opinion it could not be put where it is by natural means"; further, "It is easier to get a ring over the hand than to get it off again"; and, finally, "Dr. Wyld produced a loop of soft wire which he stated was exactly the size of the ring; the medium tried to get his hand through the loop, but appeared unable to do so."

True, I produced a loop of soft copper wire which took easily the shape of every curve in the hand, and I begged Mr. Maskelyne to try and pass it over Mr. Husk's hand, but he very shrewdly declined to make the attempt, no doubt seeing at a glance, that the operation would be impossible, and that if he tried and failed I should score one.

Further, by means of a similar soft copper loop any one can at once convince himself that it cannot possibly be forced over Mr. Husk's hand, either "pear-shaped" or in any other possible form.

I scarcely think I could have been so sly or so "green" as to ask Mr. Maskelyne to admit that the ring could not be placed where it is by natural means. To admit this would, of course, have been to admit that there was such a thing, in so-called Spiritualism, as the supernatural, and this, of course, I could not have been so rude as to ask him to admit!

My object in submitting the examination of the ring in situ to Mr. Maskelyne, was to get the most hypercritical opinion and most ingenious suggestion as to how the ring came where it is; and all that he could suggest was, cold welding. But this, as I have already said, has no weight, as the ring can be shown not to have been cold welded, and those who still say it might, should prove their opinion by the operation on a similar ring while on a man's arm.

If they will do this I will undertake to prove to them that my ring is not cold welded.

As to Mr. Husk soaking his hand in hot water, and so softening it as to be able to squeeze the ring over the hand, I would remark that hot water generally swells almost all bodies, including all hands. If Mr. Husk's hand were made of jelly it might be thus softened, but hot water does not soften bones. A solution of sulphuric acid should have been suggested; and who will be so bold as to say that Mr. Husk has not by this means dissolved all the bones of his hand, and reduced it to a roly-poly substance and thus got the ring on! For are not all these mediums up to every possible sort of trick!

Mr. Maskelyne says a ring can be got easier on than off a hand. Perhaps he is thinking of tight finger rings, which certainly are easier placed on the fingers than removed; but I have found it to be the contrary with my ring No. 1, which many ladies can, by force, pass over their hands, and in all such cases they find it much easier to remove the ring from the wrist than to place it there.

Mr. Gurney, in the last number of "LIGHT," says, "So far from Mr. Maskelyne's verdict reversing ours, as Dr. Wyld asserts, the two are entirely coincident."

In reply, I am again obliged to complain of Mr. Gurney's rash assertions, for he delivered the opinion, that if the form of the ring were altered it might be removed from Mr. Husk's hand, but Mr. Maskelyne is far too clever thus to implicate himself, and so he shifts the responsibility and says, "that is a question for a surgeon rather than a mechanician."

Well, I received a surgical as well as a medical education, and as a surgeon I assert that the ring, alter its shape as you choose, could not possibly be forced over Mr. Husk's hand without serious fracture of the hand, and in "LIGHT," April 11th, Dr. Speer, who likewise received a surgical education, says, "I have carefully examined the ring upon Mr. Husk's wrist, and entirely agree with the opinion expressed by Dr. Wyld as to the verdict of Messrs. Barrett and Gurney."

In conclusion, Mr. Husk will probably be at the Spiritual Alliance meeting at St. James Banqueting Hall, on the 24th inst., at eight o'clock, to submit the ring to further examination.

His remains are laid in the cemetery at Argenteuil.—Revue Spirite.

INCREDULITY.

The late Professor Clifford published an article entitled "The Sin of Credulity." An apostle of human progress cannot serve it better than by insisting on the association of intellectual and moral responsibility. But the principle is of little value if enforced merely in the interests of a one-sided tendency, and is of still less value if the tendency thus powerfully recommended is that to which public opinion is already sufficiently disposed. By public opinion, in this case, I mean that which prevails among the educated classes. It was to them, certainly, that Professor Clifford's warning was addressed. He spoke with the voice of the Zeit-Geist, which necessarily regards itself as representing and conserving the best hopes of human civilisation. Any opposition to this stream of tendency, so long, at least, as the latter rolls with unabated force, must struggle with difficulties which hardly need to be reinforced by moral sanctions. On the other hand, there is real danger to intellectual progress when an atmosphere of thought takes the place of thinking on any given subjects, and when human beliefs are determined, not by nature and evidence, but by a subjective environment.

It would be unphilosophical, and contrary to many recognised analogies, not to admit that the same mental liabilities which expose man to error in one direction will assuredly pursue him in his reaction to the other. We are apt to consider the first manifestation of a radical defect of character or judgment as if it were the defect itself. The tendency to credulity, for instance, is not a fact of ultimate analysis. On the contrary, such a fact when recognised will be found to include the very opposite tendency. It is that the vast majority of minds are exceedingly limp, and plastic to the thought-atmosphere about them, making a true objective relation to nature and to the evidences she affords one of the rarest achievements of individuality. And in this respect education makes no other difference than by lifting a man into another circle of influences.

No imputation on intellectual competence is more resented than that of prejudice. And yet, if we consider what prejudice means, there is hardly a pretence of individual vanity more presumptuous than the claim to be exempt from it. Of course, if a man were conscious of prejudice, it would have already lost half its force. If there is any psychological fact which the present generation of thinking men might be expected to recognise, it is that the intellectual environment has a potency similar to the physical. Adaptation to it is the condition of whatever of influence, respect, estimation, and sympathy can fall to any one's share in intellectual intercourse. These advantages do not, indeed, occur to the mind as conscious motives or determinants; their operation is far more subtle. Could the question whether the presumptions of an educated class may not be radically wrong present itself to the average individual who has not been led by special circumstances to entertain it, there is enough of spirit and honesty to secure for it a hearing. But until thus questioned, those presumptions operate, unacknowledged and unrecognised, as a weight on one of the scales of judgment. Or rather the scales themselves are untrue.

But as if it were not bad enough that every intellectual epoch should be unavoidably biased by its prepossessions, in our day these prepossessions have been actually exalted into a principle of judgment. That principle has been formulated in the well-known and often repeated proposition that "evidence should be proportioned to the probability of the fact to be proved." I will not here repeat the arguments by which I have formerly endeavoured to demonstrate its fallacy.* Enough to say that, on the contrary, the value of evidence is just the improbability, according to experience, of its being forthcoming for that which is not a fact, and that this value cannot be in the least affected by the nature of the fact to be proved, except so far as the latter may suggest peculiar fallacies in the evidence. Our only real measure of probability is positive experience, which informs us that a certain given quality and quantity of evidence is rarely, or never, consistent with the non-existence of a corresponding fact.

The above remarks have been suggested by Mr. Watson's article in last week's "LIGHT"—"A Plea for Unbelievers." I find myself much at variance with Mr. Watson on the general conditions of belief and unbelief. He thinks that they are, and must be, determined by evidence, whereas I submit that mental preconceptions of what is probable or possible are the source of nearly every erroneous estimate of evidence, whether on the side of credulity or of incredulity. Hear Mr. Watson himself "let the cat out of the bag" by saying: "By evidence I mean, of course, personal observation. Right or wrong, people will not accept such a startling theory merely on the ipse dixit of others, however truthful or trustworthy they may be." Now this inability to accept unfamiliar facts, on testimony, springs from just that same intellectual defect which, in another age of the world, would induce, and has induced, a too facile credulity. In the one case evidence is slighted, in the other case it is supplemented, by predisposition to reject or to believe. That predisposition objectifies itself in a wholly imaginary standard of "probability." In Nature, of course, nothing is probable or improbable, only existent or non-existent. To say that a thing is improbable is merely to avow an indisposition to believe it. If, indeed, the thing conflicts with positive experience, then the indisposition is justified on the principle of the uniformity of nature. But its absence from such experience only means that it has got to be proved, not that its proof must be other in kind, or even in degree, than that of any other fact.

I quite agree with Mr. Watson as to the difficulty of obtaining anything like conclusive proof of these phenomena by personal observation. I have myself made that remark again and again in print when too confident Spiritualists have pointed to personal investigation as an easy means of conviction. I wish we could say to Mr. Watson: go on, and you will certainly succeed. The tone of his letter must command our sympathy and respect, but while he sticks to his proposition that these facts are not to be believed unless they are personally witnessed it is impossible to offer him much encouragement. I think he will obtain some valuable hints as to the mental conditions of success from a perusal of the letter of your respected correspondent "S. E. de M." in last week's "LIGHT." But it will be much better if he will review the grounds upon which the facts seem to him to require the evidence of his own senses. Would he say the same if all the world accepted them except himself? If not, what proportion of the vox populi would he require?

I have only to add that it seems quite a mistake to suppose that lasting assent can be compelled by personal experience when the facts do not adapt themselves to the mental categories. I know two persons, at least, of my own acquaintance, men of high intellectual culture according to present standards, in whom the impression of these facts, once personally witnessed and declared inexplicable, has gradually faded, until now they are nearly as sceptical as ever.

WALWORTH SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION (43, Manor-place, Walworth-road).—On Sunday evening last Miss Young visited us, and her instructors delivered through her an address touching on the power which spiritual knowledge gives to human beings when they are bereft of friends and relatives, and telling how men can best improve themselves to fit them for noble occupation in the spirit spheres. After the address, the medium, in a semi-trance state, told how she had clairvoyantly witnessed the passing away of her sister some months previously. Many present expressed a hope that ere long she would occupy the platform again.—On Sunday next, Mr. Robson, of Peckham, will speak. South London friends are specially invited to be present.

* They will be found in the appendix to my translation of Zellner, under the title, "The Value of Testimony in Matters Extraordinary."

THE DIFFICULTIES OF SPIRITUAL INVESTIGATION.

There is unquestionably much truth in what Mr. S. G. Watson says in his letter in last week's "LIGHT." On the other hand, he does not, I think, see to how great an extent the state of things which he laments is an almost inevitable consequence of the past history and present position of the phenomena called "spiritual."

I propose to refer only to one part of his letter in which he mentions the ease with which evidence of the reality of certain facts in physical science can be obtained by anyone who wishes to witness them. A little consideration will show, it seems to me, that no sort of comparison of the kind your correspondent makes can reasonably be drawn.

The present position of physical science is due to the unwearied patient investigation and thoughtful study of numbers of minds trained to habits of accurate observation and correct reasoning, extending over long periods of years. The results which have been attained have in most cases followed long series of failures and abortive attempts. Let us take two or three illustrations. How long it is since the electric spark was discovered; and how short a time since the light has been controlled and utilised for purposes of illumination! What mental power and mechanical ingenuity are at this moment being expended in endeavours after further successful development! Again, the simple facts on which telegraphy is based were known long before it was possible to hold a conversation between the two ends of a wire thousands of miles long. Again, in photography, call to mind the skill and patience, and delicate experimental work which have resulted in the advance which has been made since the earliest attempts fifty years ago. These illustrations might be multiplied.

Now let us turn to the phenomena called "spiritual." It is no libel on the majority of those on whose statements the reality of the phenomena rest, to say that they do not belong to the class whose mental powers and training qualify them for investigation. And it is no libel on the majority of those who possess these qualities, to say that they have, wisely or unwisely, totally ignored and tabooed the inquiry, and have denied the existence of the alleged facts.

How infinitesimally few and far between have been the attempts to study or to develop the phenomena called spiritual, in the spirit in which so many have ardently devoted themselves to physical science! It is not to be denied that the difficulties are great and peculiar. A whole world of other influences comes in, which have not to be taken into account in researches into the kingdom of inorganic nature. But this is no sufficient reason for the way in which the alleged facts have been treated. Difficulties should only incite the true seeker after knowledge to greater exertion.

A serious attempt at investigation, and, so far as the writer knows, almost the only one of its kind, was made by the Dialectical Society fifteen years ago. The facts, then testified to, stand upon record. The method pursued and the carefulness of the observers have never been impugned.* If similar facts had been recorded in any recognised branch of natural science; if, for instance, instead of unexplained movements of tables, the problem to be solved had been unexplained movements of Jupiter's satellites, the attention of astronomers all over the world would have been excited, and no pains would have been spared to test the accuracy of the observations. Nothing is to be gained by blaming scientific men, although we may think they have manifested a great lack of the true scientific spirit.

It could not therefore be anticipated that the laws and conditions which govern "spiritual" phenomena should have been ascertained to the extent requisite to enable them to be exhibited to order, in the same way as physical experiments. Reverting to our analogy, and granting the reality of a psychic movement or of a psychic rap, it was to be expected that many years of patient study and experiment would be required before messages could be transmitted at will along the psychic wire.

The need therefore for scientific investigation seems to be paramount, and as the circumstances of the case appear to demand that this can be done only, or at all events to most advantage, by groups of individuals acting in unison, it is obvious that the difficulties will always be great, and that the inquiry will need the exercise of long-continued patience and care.

It is exceedingly difficult for an inquirer to obtain satisfactory evidence by any amount of going about to miscellaneous séances. The experiences of many will enable them fully to sympathise with Mr. Watson. When, years ago, diligently endeavouring, in concert with two friends, to obtain facts, the writer well remembers the repeated disappointments and discouragements that were met with. But failures were not invariable. On one occasion in particular, at a private circle, with a medium who subsequently became well-known professionally, striking and convincing successes were obtained. A few facts thus established, when the conditions are unimpeachable, over-balance multitudes of failures, and it is not in accordance with sound reason to allow their intrinsic value to be depreciated, or to fade away in the mind, by anything that may subsequently occur.

The number of persons is very small who, after a fair amount of investigation, have not convinced themselves of the reality of occurrences which defy explanation on any recognised hypothesis. This ought to be a great incentive to perseverance. The cause of the phenomena is a different question altogether. Whatever may be the conclusion of individual minds, it is clear that no general consensus can be arrived at until far greater progress has been made in the systematic examination and classification of facts than has yet been accomplished.

The best course to be pursued by such inquirers would seem to be to find a few sincere minds who would work with him, and to commence a course of study on the general lines pursued by the committee of the Dialectical Society which has been referred to, all or nearly all of whom were at first unbelievers.

A STUDENT.

Facts reports, in its April number, phenomena occurring in the presence of Mrs. Whitney at Boston. Drs. Crockett and Richardson, of that city, as committee, put up, in full light, a cabinet made of four slender posts, each a yard and a-half high, within which was suspended a shelf, on which nothing but musical instruments were placed. The cabinet was completed by entirely covering it with a dark curtain, except in the front. Before this Mrs. Whitney took a seat, and was then enveloped, excepting her head, in a similar curtain, the sides of it being fastened to that covering the cabinet, leaving the upper part of it visible over the medium's shoulders, enabling the audience to see materialised hands moving about playing instruments, &c. We select the following from the phenomena which presented themselves: A tumbler containing water was put over the medium's shoulder into the cabinet, and was presently returned empty; there was nothing in the cabinet to receive or absorb water, and there was not a sign of its having been spilt. The tumbler was put back into the cabinet, and was returned with water in it. Again it was put back; this time it was returned containing water and a bunch of pansies, the perfect freshness of which was vouched by the audience. Some leaves, detached from a new paper pad, were put into the cabinet. Two were returned written on. One, addressed to Mr. Whitlock, was dated "Spirit Land," and written in the name of a departed sister; in the corner were a few words over her father's initials. The writing on the other leaf was addressed to a widow lady, with her departed husband's full signature, and below it a few words with that of a departed relative.

SYMPNEUMATA: OR, EVOLUTIONARY FORCES NOW ACTIVE IN MAN.
Price 10s. 6d. Edited by LAWRENCE OLIPLANT. Edinburgh:

(Concluded from p. 185.)

This is the question whether we are to admit at all of the evolution of a psychic organism possessed of transcendent capabilities, as is intimated in this book. Assuredly the evolution of such an organism is a fact; but the sympleumatic presentation of it differs widely from the true one as a travesty from its original. For, in the first place, the change of which it is the token and result has its initiation and procession in the soul through the operation therein of the divine spirit of the individual, and all that the exterior man, whether solid or fluid, can do towards it is to facilitate it by acquiescence in the régime of pure aspiration and conduct suited to its accomplishment. Hence, the importance attached by mystics, among other things, to diet, a subject on which this book is silent, no word in it implying the incompatibility of a régime involving violence and bloodshed and a breach of love, with the requirements of the regenerative process. But this by the way. The prime fallacy involved in the presentation before us is that, whereas the process takes place in and by means of the soul, and only by means of the soul can it occur, the soul finds no recognition, but the Sympleuma itself is made the soul.

The "new creature" of mystical science, again, is not a fluidic, but a spiritual being, and represents the "great work" of the Hermetists, the redemption of spirit from matter altogether, whether solid or fluidic, and not the reconstitution of the individual of any particular kind of matter. If matter, whether in its solid or its fluidic state, be employed at all in the construction of the man regenerate, it will not constitute the man himself, but only his phenomenal capsule, and this is not the function assigned to the Sympleuma. And so far, moreover, from the process of regeneration involving the conversion of the individual into a bisexual entity in the physiological sense, its function consists in the elaboration and perpetuation of that in him which is possessed of no sex whatever in that sense, namely, of his divine and true Ego. And whether it is a man or a woman who is concerned, the method and the result are the same for both. And so far from the accomplishment of the process requiring concentration upon, and devotion to, the idea of such a being as the Sympleuma is described to be, such a diversion of aspiration from the soul's only true source and centre would seriously imperil the process.

This book, on the contrary, makes regeneration altogether external to, and independent of, the soul, of which, as just said, it takes no account, by locating the process in the fluidic region, and varies it according to the physiological sex of the subject. For, as we are told, with the man the Sympleuma manifests itself interiorly, "by the inflow of pure feminine vitalities by the accession of the Sympleuma's personality"; and with the woman, exteriorly, by "the embrace that steals upon her sense, as her Sympleuma's form constructs itself around and over her" (p. 145).

We have demurred to the term mystical as inapplicable to the system before us, but we are not therefore reduced to the ordinary extreme antithetical term, materialistic, in order to characterise it. Strictly speaking it is materialistic in that it ignores man's spiritual nature in favour of his fluidic, which is but a mode of the material, and which, notwithstanding its tenuity, is as absolutely removed from the spiritual as the molecular from the non-molecular. It is true that it represents ostensibly a revolt against the grosser materialism now in vogue; but this does not constitute it an ally of spirituality, for its revolt is not against materiality, but against solidity. So that it is as if Materialism, driven from its outworks, had taken up what it conceived to be a more defensible position on an inner line. This is to say that instead of representing an ascent to the real antithesis of the material and terrestrial, namely, the spiritual, this book represents a halt, after a single upward step, in the rarer airs of the fluidic and astral, and the building there of another materialism differing from its predecessor in respect only of physical density.

We find ourselves, in fact, in the presence of a new ism, namely, Fluidism, and the term is one which expresses exactly the system it denotes. For it indicates the nature at once of the region, or medium, it represents, of the entities it exalts, and of the doctrine it inculcates, each alike being fluidic and un-substantial. For the region is that of the vague and tenuous astral ether; the entities are those—not which, being real, simply inhabit this medium—but which are actually constituted of it; and the doctrine consists in the exaltation of what are phantasmal reflects in the place of substantial soul. For, in consisting, as the book tells us, of the fluidic material which occupies the interspaces of the animal organism, and being therefore but an emanation from the body, the Sympleuma cannot at all be accounted as soul, which knows nothing of interspaces or of place at all, being spiritual substance. And this being so, as it avowedly is, and the Sympleuma being, also avowedly, the inspiring source of the book, we see no escape from the conclusion that the writers have fallen victims to the very influences they so emphatically denounce and so distinctly define, and are themselves, not under inspiration at all, which is of the soul, but under "obsession in and through their earth-borrowed outer organism" (p. 220). This is to say that, not having with Hermes—the supreme Initiator into Sacred Mysteries—vanquished and slain the delusive Argus of the Astral, or with Odysseus stopped their ears against its siren strains, they have taken the Sympleuma's assertions at its own valuation, and believed that the highest plane of the body is the highest plane of the man; which is as much as to say that the body is the man; but we will not now follow out that aspect of the doctrine. The failure, however, is not without its compensations. Whatever is good and true in their book—and it contains much that is good and true—may now be accredited to themselves and not to their Sympleumata, seeing that it must have emanated from themselves in order to be reflected back to the latter.

Re-reading with reference to this book the account given in "The Perfect Way" of this region and its denizens, it seems to us that the account might have been written expressly of this book, so closely does it describe the nature and characteristics of the entities concerned. We will specify some of these characteristics as exhibited in the book before us, and leave the comparison to our readers. The list includes, among others, the formation of the obsessing influences exclusively from the magnetic fluids of the body, and their consequent complete want of sympathy with anything that is not similarly constituted, as shown by their antipathy to whatever is solid, the mineral, vegetable, animal, and human worlds being for them, one and all, tainted with evil on this account (pp. 113-14); their unconsciousness of their own inconsistency, as in describing divinity as "served by the untainted loves" (of the fluidic man), "for mankind and the creation beneath him" (p. 26), while denouncing that creation as utterly foul and vile; their insistence on the repudiation by their human associates of any relationship which might divert into other channels the vitality on which the Sympleuma subsists, this being the real cause of their abhorrence of the ordinary sex-relations; their alluring tones and lavish promises of sensational compensations, with the same view; their indiscriminate reflection of whatever is presented to them, and acceptance of the literal and apparent meanings, however gross, of expressions really symbolical, and their failure to discern the true significance; their free use of the Divine name without any conception of the Divine Nature; their unconsciousness of the immensity of the interval which separates the extremes of existence, as shown by their making the bodily fluids the immediate residence of Deity; their ignorance of the real nature and meaning of man, and consequent failure either to recognise him as a microcosm legitimately comprising all regions of being within himself, or to recognise the world as redeemed in man through the taking up in him of all its higher consciousnesses into the Divine; their assumption of an identity of meaning in terms when employed on different planes, irrespectively of the nature of the plane, and the consequent ascription of physical attributes to spiritual principles; their profuseness in protestation and vagueness in definition; their hollowiness and insincerity as shown in their use of ardent benevolent expressions as a mask for selfish and cruel designs, such as is the attempt to sacrifice the whole human race in their own interests; the narrowness and exclusiveness of their sympathies, as shown in their contempt, and even loathing for human affections, marital and parental, when subsisting between human beings, as well as for the animals, and in their especial hatred of woman, as shown in their insistence on her practical suppression by being banished from all useful activities into seclusion and isolation, and this under pretence of restoring and promoting her; their failure to recognise human relations on the physical plane as among the appointed and indispensable means of human education and development on all planes, and their denial, practically involved, of the doctrine on which they strenuously insist, that of the essential humanity of Deity; their inability to recognise the reality of the soul, or of any principle in man capable of subsisting independently of the physical organism; their untruthfulness in claiming to be themselves the inspiring sources of the ideas they mechanically reflect; and to close, but not to exhaust the list, their defect of ethical perception and purpose, and ignorance of the real nature of love and of its ennobling effects, whether of love or of duty, as shown by the insidious intimation of man's exemption, under their rule, of any call for self-sacrifice (p. 59).

Though capable of so much evil, these influences, it is necessary to remark, are not in themselves evil; but are purely negative, their influence being a limiting one. And instead of constituting an addition to the system in which they are present, as by accretion from without, they represent but a pathological condition of that system, corresponding to that which occurs by the diversion of its vital forces from their normal operation to the formation of morbid activities. No actual entity perishes through the elimination of these astral reflects, any more than in the case of some morbid outgrowth in the "solid" part of the system, such as a tumour. The force expended in sustaining them is but returned into its proper channel, wherefore in cultivating and systematising these fluidic outgrowths in themselves, the writers have, it seems to us, committed the very error they deprecate, namely, that of seeking to normalise what is in itself morbid.

There are expressions in the book which seem to imply not only astral, but elemental, influences as the agents of the experiences described; in which case Sympleumata would represent, not merely what is morbid, but what is unnatural, namely, intercourse with beings of a different order. The elemental spirits, as is well known to occultists, are not averse to such relationships, though they lower themselves by them; and as they are able, through their extreme tenuity, to insinuate themselves into and permeate the entire body, to require a monopoly of their associates, and to adapt their teaching to the characters of these, they certainly do fulfil many of the conditions described. This explanation is one on which we forbear, for obvious reasons, to dwell, but which the language used renders it necessary to suggest. Man, it is true, has a celestial affinity; but this is not to be found in the ranks of the elementals.

In conclusion, we reiterate our assurance that nothing we have said concerning the authors of this book applies to the writers, but that we award to these the credit for all in it that is good. The earnest desire to live the highest life themselves, and to enable others to do the same; the perception of the fact that the world's spiritual consciousness is entering on a new stage of its development; and that such development, in some sense, is related to and occurs through that which has always, by mystics, been called "the woman," and implies the full realisation by humanity of its feminine principle; that by means of such advent man becomes in a sense a "biune" or twofold creature, and undergoes the regeneration which consists in such renewal and reconstitution of his being that from material he becomes spiritual, from being in a spiritual sense masculine only he becomes in a spiritual sense masculine and feminine;—all these things they have done or discerned in virtue of their own interior opening and their own advance beyond the stage of the merely physical and animal. Their mistake has lain in supposing that the very first plateau they have reached in their ascent from the lowest plane of the material was the very summit of the "Mount of the Lord," and in taking the houri dwellers of the rarer airs of that stage for veritable angels of light, simply because the loftier ranges lying above and beyond were not yet in view. The higher knowledge which comes of wider study and that fuller unfoldment of the spiritual—not fluidic—consciousness, by which man discerns principles instead of persons, would have shown them that the "fluent" is, no less than the "solid," an integral part of the "earth-borrowed organism," and must equally be transcended to reach the divine. For, the "dwellers on the threshold" of the supreme goal of man's aspiration—as they would have learnt—are manifold and various in their manifestations as are the facets of man himself, and able to adapt themselves to all his changes of growth and mood, until he has entirely outstripped them. Hence, besides being terrible in their approaches, and appealing to man's fears, they can be winning and seductive, appealing to his affections, and making even that which is best in him the bait for their snares, by causing the wrong to appear as duty, the false as truth, and, as in the case before us, seeking to divide on the pretence of a loftier union, meaning one with themselves. But though varying with each new altitude gained; being by turns siren, goblin, ogre, or "chimera dire," and by turns striving to delay, daunt, turn back, or destroy; they are always but modes of the seeker's own outer and lower self, and represent but the desperate attempts of that self to withhold the man from his true goal, the Soul and the God who dwells therein.

The present era has been truly styled a "time of making known." But this is a process, it is necessary to point out, which is dual, having two factors, the lesson and the learner; and unless the latter be in a due condition of receptivity, through the previous education of his understanding, no truth can be demonstrated to him, but truth itself becomes error. Under the spiritual wave now advancing over the earth, a vast region of existence, hitherto concealed from all but a special few, has suddenly been disclosed; and while they who have been made cognisant of its reality are many, they who are fitted to explore its depths and to expound its phenomena, are few. For there is no knowledge save by experience, even though the organon be the soul and the subject divine; and experience means time. Meanwhile as experiences multiply and with each fresh observer take fresh forms, the doctrines confidently based on them will be many and diverse, inundating the world, as of old under analogous conditions, with new revelations and schemes of belief. And this will go on until, as also of old, it will require oecumenical councils of the elect to separate the wheat from the chaff, the gold from the dross, the true from the false, in a word, the divine from the astral, and so to point infallibly the way of salvation. But numerous and sometimes pernicious as will doubtless be the heresies thus engendered in, and discarded by, the now nascent Church of the Future, there will, in our belief, be none so deserving of anathema, because none so specious and noxious, as that which has had its inception on the slope of the Rocky Mountains, and its formulation and promulgation on the slope of Mount Carmel. Aware, as we are, that it has long been secretly in the world, we feel that we cannot be too thankful to the Providence which has withheld it from the world until there was knowledge in the world sufficient—as we firmly believe—and available for the judgment of it.

MR. J. H. POLLEN.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letter of Mr. S. C. Hall in your last issue is likely (although I am sure without the venerable writer's intention) to place me in a false position towards your readers and to become an obstacle to my obtaining employment.

Mr. Hall says that he does not know my antecedents; I did not say he did. I only said I was known to him, and I did so at Mr. Hall's own suggestion, after he had read the testimonials I showed to him, and which I am ready to show to anyone wishing to give me employment. I hope that the venerable gentleman will recall to mind the circumstances which led to my making the statement.

I do not presume to ask a rectification from Mr. Hall on this subject after the great kindness shown me by him, but I shall depend in future on the written testimonials to my character, which I can show.—Yours respectfully, 145, New North-road, N.

THE Revue Spirite calls attention to a proof of respect to the memory of a Spiritist, Victor Vabre. His employer closed the factory on the day of the burial, and at the head of his workmen, 250 in number, joined the family and friends in the procession to the cemetery. Victor Vabre never made a secret of his Spiritism and of being a writing medium. His wife was a Spiritist, the daughter of M. and Madame Michel, the respected leaders of the Saint Antoine Spiritist Society. She has received communications from him. He says: "During our life we did not make troubles; I pray you not to grieve me by your grief—you who know what death really is."

SCIENTIFIC AUTHORITIES AND SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA.

We are being perpetually reminded by outsiders that we ought to persuade or convince scientific authorities of the truth or actual existence of the phenomena which it is stated occur under certain conditions. What do scientific authorities say? is an oft repeated inquiry, and is merely the modern form of repeating the old sentence—What do the Chief Priests and Pharisees say? The suggestion is one which may, or may not, be of great value, and it is, therefore, one on which we may, and ought to reason.

Not so many years ago there was a form of authority which claimed to possess a profound knowledge on all subjects, and which endeavoured to stop or check all inquiry to which it was opposed. This has been termed "priestcraft." If any man were independent and bold enough to think for himself, and his convictions caused him to differ from the authorities, he was sent to the Bastille or the stake. Fortunately this obstacle to the advancement of truth has to a great extent been removed, but we have in its place another obstruction which may be termed Scientific Priestcraft, or Scientific Authority.

To question the infallibility of priestcraft was a dreadful crime, but to prove that this infallibility was mere humbug would not have been difficult. The ignorant, or those incapable of investigation, were taken in by the pretentious claims of those who asserted they were infallible, whilst reasoners who did not accept such assumptions were removed. We have no fear in the present day of either the Bastille or the stake, so we may venture to inquire as to the claims of some individuals to be scientific authorities, and we may then be better able to form an opinion, as to the advantage or necessity of obtaining the judgment of these, on questions which they may have investigated only superficially or not at all.

In very many instances, we find that some youth, on account of his being steady, or because he may have shown talent, or a taste for some special science, or may be the near relative of some man who may hold an efficient position in some scientific department, is taken as an assistant.

By merely working in a groove during many years, he by the mere effect of seniority at length becomes head of the department. He may never have shown any examples of great mental power, he may never have discovered anything, and all his life he has done nothing but try experiments, and then lecture about and exhibit these, and forthwith he stands before the unreasoning public as a great scientific authority whose opinion is supposed infallible. Such a man is not deficient in worldly wisdom. He is not the one to state that he cannot venture to give a decision, as regards questions which he has not fully and carefully investigated, but in the majority of cases he will eagerly pronounce a verdict, and if the asserted facts are beyond, or opposed to, his previous experience, he rushes in and gives his decided opinion with all the confidence of authority.

Tables, chairs, and other articles rise in the air, and float about the room without contact, say thousands of witnesses. Unconscious pressure, says a scientific authority, will account for it all—I proved it can, because once or twice I tried the experiment, and I found a table moved, and the sitters pushed it, but were unconscious of having done so. Then the ignorant and unthinking join in chorus and say, what idiots people are to believe that tables and chairs, and other articles move, or rise in the air, when a great scientific authority proved that unconscious pressure accounted for everything!

Then, again, we may find a man who, having gathered together the discoveries of other people, starts as a popular lecturer, and assumes the position of a teacher on some subject. He may never have discovered anything, or exhibited any evidence of great mental power, but nevertheless he sets up as an "authority" and pronounces a verdict as though he were the competent judge of all difficult problems. In too many instances these self-elected authorities not only exhibit a self-sufficiency which is never found in connection with great mental powers, but they also display an insolence and arrogance, when their infallibility is questioned and they are reminded that facts are stubborn things, which is so like the priestcraft of old, that we feel thankful that the Bastille and the stake have been abolished.

Who, then, are the authorities who, it is so necessary, should be convinced of facts? Are they some of the men whose attention has been devoted to chemical experiments and lecturing, or those who have made up popular lectures, or who, having large incomes, start newspapers and circulate their ideas, and refuse to insert in these papers any facts which prove their opinions to be erroneous, and who, one and all, have never fairly examined the evidence for the phenomena? Or are these authorities some specially gifted men whose powers of mind are so gigantic that they, without any investigation, can know more about a subject than others who have devoted years of examination to this same question. We cannot admit a mental priestcraft in the present day, and we naturally demand some proof of these wonderful powers, which, whether they admit it or not, are most certainly claimed by certain men, who have the audacity to assert that they know what can and what cannot occur, in connection with the subtle laws appertaining to spirit and matter.

Authorities have ever been stumbling-blocks to the advancement of truth, and it has been truly said, 'That one of the most formidable obstacles to the advancement of Science has ever been a blind submission to Authority.'

MR. W. EGLINTON has now entered upon his new domicile at 6, Nottingham-place, W. (near Baker-street Station), where all communications for him should be addressed. We understand that Mr. Eglinton intends to devote his attention exclusively to psychography, and that under no circumstances will he give sances for materialisation. While regretting the loss of his services in this respect we cannot but feel that Mr. Eglinton is wise in his determination.

THE ECLECTIC PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED.

The Fifth Annual Meeting of the members of this Company was held on the 14th inst., at 23, St. Swithin's-lane, London, E.C. Mr. Morell Theobald was voted to the chair. The Secretary having read the notice convening the meeting, the minutes of the annual meeting last year were read, and signed as correct.

The following Report of the Directors was then read, accompanied by a Financial Statement, comprising a balance-sheet and a profit and loss account for the year ending 31st December, 1884:—

"The Directors are glad to be able to give an encouraging report of the progress which 'LIGHT' has made since the commencement of 1884. A considerable impetus was given to its circulation at the time of the Church Congress last year, mainly owing to the energy of Mr. J. S. Farmer, and it was gratifying to observe that the increase then gained was permanent. The practical evidence of this is shown in the returns from Mr. E.W. Allen, the publisher. The amount received from sales by him in 1884 was £31 6s. 6d. in excess of the previous year.

"Since the beginning of the present year a further strong impetus seems to have been given to the circulation by the issue of the chromo-lithographs, for the production of which the warm thanks of the proprietors are due to Mr. J. G. Keulemans. It is hoped that this advance also will be permanent.

"The result is that the present demand for 'LIGHT' is over 400 weekly in excess of what it was this time last year. A few more similar steps forward would place the paper on a satisfactory business footing.

"That result has, however, not yet been attained, and the liberality of friends has again placed in the hands of the Directors a 'Sustentation Fund' to meet the losses of the present year.

"The usual Statement of Accounts is presented to the meeting, made up to the 31st of December, 1884, and audited by Messrs. Theobald Bros. and Miall. Special mention should be made of a generous donation of £50 from the Hon. Percy Wyndham, M.P., towards the expenses of last year.

"The final success of the paper depends on the interest taken and support given both by contributors and subscribers. The Directors hope, therefore, that this will not only continue, but increase.

"The Directors who retire in rotation are Messrs. D. G. FitzGerald and J. G. Meugens. Being eligible they offer themselves for re-election.

"On behalf of the Board,

"E. DAWSON ROGERS,

"Chairman.

"14th April, 1885."

A considerable interchange of opinion took place as to the general conduct of "LIGHT," especially in regard to the prominence it was desirable to give to Theosophical articles, and to subjects allied to Spiritualism proper, and also in relation to the unrestricted insertion of correspondence. Signor Damiani, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, Mr. Younger, the Chairman, and others expressed their views on these matters. The adoption of the Report having been moved and seconded, was, after a free and interesting discussion, carried unanimously.

In reference to some remarks which had been made, the Secretary desired it to be clearly understood that the books were open to the full and free inspection of any shareholder who desired to see them.

The retiring Directors, Messrs. Desmond D. FitzGerald and J. G. Meugens, were unanimously re-elected.

A vote of thanks to Messrs. Theobald Bros. and Miall for their services and for the use of their offices for the meeting, closed the proceedings.

Subscribers to "LIGHT" Sustentation Fund may see a copy of the accounts on application to the Secretary.

THE subscription list for Mr. W. Eglinton's forthcoming biography, entitled "Twixt Two Worlds," has not yet reached the requisite limit to justify publication. If all who intend to take copies of the book will make immediate application to Mr. C. Manning, 6, Nottingham-place, W., the obstacles will, no doubt, be at once removed.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

VII.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

To many, the idea of "ghosts" or "spirits" being compelled to abstract from the living a certain principle or element wherewith to construct for themselves a visible or solid body, and the garments required to cover it, must seem utterly preposterous. Spiritualists, however, take it to be, if not a demonstrated fact, at least the only logical explanation of some observed phenomena. But there may be many amongst believers in these strange realities to whom a theory of a more sublime or preternatural origin (than that of the abstraction of the required element for the formation of drapery from the medium's clothes) would be far more welcome. But, if séance-room "spirits" are not in themselves—and from a certain point of view—absurdities, why smile at the supposition that, if their temporary body requires covering at all, the material has to be derived from that particular source to which they have direct access, viz., the objects that are in contact with the medium's person and his "magnetism?"

Considering also that these familiars are presumably—we may perhaps be allowed to say undoubtedly—in constant proximity to their medium (if not actually partaking of, and thus far, in some degree, identical with, the latter's individual existence), the supposition that the medium's sleep affords them some extra facilities for obtaining the necessary "counterpart" is only reasonable. Sleep, if not in itself a partial trance, is certainly allied to that state of coma. Assuming trance to be a temporary severance of the spiritual and physical bodies, and the latter to be, in that condition, little more than a living corpse, there is no reason why it may not be taken possession of, and serve as a store for supplying the force, the so-called "power" necessary for the production of the various physical manifestations. During the medium's sleep, the abstraction of the counterpart is not only facilitated, but the material by which he is surrounded, and which is charged with his magnetism, would, by its nature, shape, and dimensions, also simplify further operations. In fact, the linen may be considered "spirit-clothing ready made." The "familiars" with whom I am in the habit of conversing do not directly contradict my speculations. On the contrary, they confirm, indirectly, these conclusions, and have gone so far as to make a further concession by stating that the reason of their reticence on the drapery subject is due to a fear of being ridiculed. The direct admission would tend to jeopardise their reputation, for they seem to be perfectly aware that their actual state of existence, or the condition in which we observe them, is too human to satisfy the universally preconceived notions of what spirits should be like. Hence their reticence and prevarications when requested to explain the real state of affairs.

Allusion has already been made to the apparent anomaly of a transformed or transfigured medium appearing to the circle clad in drapery. To satisfactorily explain such a strange occurrence, or to explain away its incongruity, is more than my experience allows me to undertake. Even the greater experience of many co-investigators fails to help me. There are some loose theories and speculations current to account for the occurrence, but as yet no explanation seems acceptable or rational. Under the still prevailing system of conducting sances (which is little more than wonder-seeking and indulging in the emotional, and a perfect parody on really scientific experimentation) we cannot know what constitutes a transformation. We cannot, in fact, save with a few exceptions, determine the real nature of any apparition. The medium being invisible, or placed inside a cabinet, there is no means left to distinguish between a real materialisation, a transformation, or a so-called "animation by an extraneous intelligence." Granted the reality of the spiritual cause or meaning of these transformations, and, assuming that, under certain conditions, their reality can, none the less, be determined, we should be still unable to account for the presence and meaning of the drapery in which such apparitions are exhibited. Moreover, if we adopt the theory that the solidification of a spiritual counterpart is due to contact with a magnetic fluid (the "power"), it would follow that such contact (since it is required to build up a materialisation) should also produce a similar effect upon the invisible intelligence itself, unless spirits can arbitrarily induce the formation of the one and check, or counteract, the development of the other. However, I fail to comprehend what object a spirit can have in view in causing his medium to mimic a genuine materialisation. Yet it is not at all impossible that the spirit so acting may be mistaken as to the actual result obtained. Some spirits may not know what it is to materialise, and may be ignorant of the effects produced upon our senses. It is more than probable that the majority of séance-room spirits, especially those who use the medium's body, have no idea whatsoever as regards their temporary surroundings, and have no cognisance of the fact that in most cases, even in a materialisation, the medium's type and features are still preserved.

Moreover, our present knowledge of what constitutes a materialisation is too imperfect—the subject too inexplicable, to permit, as yet, any positive assertions. Nor does it appear to be warrantable to limit a materialisation exclusively to the visible development of the "form." A transformation may, in some degree, represent a partial materialisation; or, in other words, there may be a certain amount of "form-building" within a transformation; and to this may be due the often perceptible difference in height, size, and physiognomy between the normal and the transformed medium.

BAXTER, in his "Certainty of the World of Spirits," says: "A gentleman, formerly pious, of late hath fallen into drunkenness, and when he hath slept himself sober something knocks on his bed's head, as if one knocked on the wainscot. When the bed is moved the knocking follows him, and noises elsewhere that all hear. It poseth me to think what kind of spirit this is that hath such a care for this good man's soul (which makes me hope that he may recover). Is it the soul of some fond friend that yet retaineth love for him? Do good spirits dwell so near us? God keepeth yet such things from us in the dark."

GLASGOW.—Spiritualists' Hall, 2, Carlton-place, Sunday, April 19th.—Again Mrs. Wallis was a medium for the ministrations of her guides at both forenoon and evening gatherings. The discourses—clairvoyant descriptions and responses to queries in the forenoon—were, respectively, elevated, convincing, and satisfactory, leaving an impression on the mind of time well and profitably spent. "Spiritual Growth," the subject of the evening discourse, was preceded by a beautiful invocation, and it was well sustained and vigorously worked out. Viewing man in relation to his needs, the speaker traced the development of humanity from its uncouth physical beginnings, when only the needs of the external or physical body clamoured for satisfaction; she described the results in growth which the efforts put forth to appease those wants had gradually accomplished, and went on to show how intellectual and spiritual needs grew out of the life-struggles and unfoldment of the race, individually and collectively. In urging the necessity for personal endeavour after spiritual growth, an attempt was made to define what this growth really means, by the portrayal of various spiritual conditions pertaining to individuals "on the other side"—those who had, and those who had not, acted in this life according to the dictates of conscience and right reason, inspired by wisdom, justice, and goodness. The divisional weekly meetings are likely to become a successful and useful institution in our midst. Next Sunday Mr. Wallis, who will then have returned from the Newcastle district, will occupy the platform. Subject for the evening: "Sacred Scriptures: Their Origin and Value."—ST. MURDO.

IMPROMPTU REPLIES THROUGH A LADY PSYCHIC OF VERY LIMITED EDUCATION.

V.
BY T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

Séance held September 6th, 1875. Present, three ladies and three gentlemen, including my musical friend, who attended the previous séance.

After waiting for a few minutes the hand of the medium wrote, "The lady sitting next Mr. Barkas must take her place directly opposite. Mr. F— opposite the medium, Mr. R— in his own seat."

Having changed places I wrote:—

Q. Are we now rightly placed?

A. No better. The lady is to sit at Mr. R—'s left hand, Mr. F— opposite the medium, Mr. P— at his left.

The questions then proceeded.

Q. Will you please to inform us if you have met Weber or Haendel and if you will be prepared to converse with us next Monday evening, or any evening you please to appoint, on the subject of their musical compositions?

A. I have seen none but Meyerbeer, and him only for a short time. I am afraid that I can give but little more information on the musical questions, but you may ask your questions, and I'll do my best.

(I picked up the following five questions from various musicians during the week, and reserved them to be asked at the séance.)

Q. What is the natural basis upon which harmonic rules are founded?

A. I am not sure that I understand the drift of the question. Please to explain.

(No explanation was given, the suggester of the question not being present.)

Q. Why does the ear receive an unpleasant sensation by a succession of fourths, fifths, and eighths, dissonances unprepared and accords proceeding by degrees?

A. They produce an unpleasant sound because they are not purely harmonious sounds; they will make the same unpleasant sensation that a discordant noise would, for no other reason that I know of. Perhaps my musical abilities have not been cultivated sufficiently, but I know of no other reason.

Q. In tuning a pianoforte, why are the fifths made flat?

A. To bring them into harmony, of course.

Q. How do you account for the formation of sound in a flute, as the air is only blown over the embouchure and scarcely any passes down the flute?

A. The air acts in the same manner as in an organ pipe, reed organs, and the vibrations are taken hold of and carried through the hollow tube; the air contained in the pipe is made to vibrate and to produce the sound. I am not practically acquainted with that instrument; but the theory for flutes is the same as organ stops.

Q. How do you account for the difference in the quality of tone in different players on the same instrument—say the flute?

A. You had better put the flute out of the question, since the tone of that instrument depends on the breath of the player; the same man playing in ill health or good health materially differs. The force with which the air is blown, &c., &c.

The following musical questions were then asked by my sceptical musical friend:—

Q. Please to inform us in what proportion the length of the tongue of a reed organ pipe differs as the vibrations increase, and if it be exactly in inverse proportion to their length?

A. Meyerbeer says in exactly inverse proportion to the square root of the reed, another friend says in inverse proportion to the length. I will try and see Weber and will tell you his opinion. I cannot say positively myself.

Q. You said that vibrations of vox humana and cremona differed from the trumpet and oboe; will you please to explain the difference in the modes of vibration of these two classes of reeds?

A. In the vox humana the vibrations are much quicker, and, therefore, more harmonics are sounded, giving a clearer and more bell-like tone to the sound. The trumpet is much slower than either the cremona or hautboy, fewer harmonics are sounded, and thus the tone is graver, flatter, and a purer sound. I wish to correct the answer I made last week. I said that acute sounds were heard sooner than grave ones. I find this is a mistake. I will explain another time.

Q. Suppose the tube of a reed pipe were nearly closed at the top, say three-fourths covered over or closed, would the reed vibrate so as to give a musical note?

A. The reed would vibrate, and a shrill, rasping sound would result, and, I should think, several octaves higher in tone.

Q. Would you please to inform us what, in your opinion, is the best form of tube for the vox humana stop?

A. I am no judge. I have had little practical acquaintance with organs. My knowledge is, as I told you, almost purely theoretical.

Q. In a Bourdon formation of pipe the three C's and the four following notes ascending are always good; the fifth note F, and the sixth note F sharp, are invariably bad. How is this, and can you suggest a remedy?

A. I should imagine it to be a fault in the construction of the organ. The generality of organ builders are for the most part ignorant of the scientific rules of music. Where can I see, or, rather, where can my medium see a good organ? I may be able to tell you after then. Tell me the names of some well-known organ builders who have come over here, and I will get you the information. But if I were to see one, I may be able to suggest a remedy.

Q. In what proportion does the intensity of sound diminish as the distance increases?

A. To the square root, precisely.

Q. In a wave of sound the air above is condensed, and the air beneath is rarified; is the temperature thereby affected?

A. You are mistaken; the air above is rarified and the sound consequently ascends. The air near the earth is much warmer because of its proximity to the heat incident to the earth; the more rarified as we ascend; and the condensed air sinks in proportion as the other ascends, and the sound waves ascend with its increase, and the sound travels much slower than in that which is more elastic.

Q. The question really intended was, Do the vibrations of a string produce heat?

A. I should say no, or in so slight a degree that it may be said to be not heat, heat being generated in the ether, not in the air.

Q. You will, of course, know that the division of an octave into twelve parts or semitones, as we have them on the keyboard of a piano or organ, is a very imperfect division of the octave. If, however, you divide an octave into fifty equal degrees, how many of those degrees will represent a major tone, how many a chromatic semitone, and how many a diatonic semitone?

A. This is a simple question. Divide the fifty notes by three and you get the major notes, divide by twelve and you get the chromatic semitones; by eleven for the diatonic. I am not sure this is the answer you require, is it so?

Q. Please to inform us what the interval is from the fourth to the fifth degree of the major diatonic scale, that is, is it a major or a minor tone?

A. There has been a mistake; take C for your key note, then E would be the major tone and G the minor, and the rest of the diatonic scale would be necessarily in the minor tone.

Q. Is from F to G a major or a minor tone?

A. A minor. What do you call a major and minor in German? I think I am puzzled by the difference in the words.

Q. Would you kindly answer a musical question put in German, your answer to be in German?

A. I have no doubt I could, always providing my medium understood the drift of the question.

Q. Will you please to inform us what year you departed this life, and entered the spiritual world?

A. 1864.

Q. Would you kindly inform us where you made the acquaintance of Meyerbeer in this world and in what year?

A. In 1852, when I was spending a vacation in Cologne.

Q. Did you ever hear performed in this world the opera "L'Africaine," or any portion of it?

A. Considering that I assisted in its production I say yes. Whether it quite suited the composer I never knew; he always gave me credit for its production, and I took very little interest in it after my name was not known; and perhaps the composition was faulty; at any rate it was not so well received as the generality of his works, perhaps on that account.

Q. Will you please to inform us in what city you assisted in the production of the opera "L'Africaine"?

A. When I say production, I wish you to understand the composition of the plot of the opera. It was first played under another name in Berlin, but it did not take, and the story of the opera was quite changed by me, with some hints from Meyerbeer, certainly under the condition that I was to receive some share of the honour, but some misunderstanding arose, and I never heard more of it, and consequently took no interest in the opera from that time. These are personal questions, and without wishing to be rude, I think it a waste of time to ask and answer them.

Q. If a note of a given intensity be produced at a height of 2,000 feet and heard in the valley below, and another exactly similar sound be produced in the valley below and heard on the mountain top, would the sounds heard be more intense on the mountain top or in the valley?

A. The sound is more intense in warmer air, owing to its greater elasticity, consequently as the air is more elastic nearer the mountain top, the sound there will be heard as distinctly as in the valley. But if a pistol be fired from the top of a mountain, the sound will considerably decrease, not only because of the difference of the density of the temperature, but because of the sound rising rather than descending; and the amplitude of vibration decreasing according to the square of the distance, you hear the sound faintly in the valley. On the other hand, the pistol being fired in the valley, the sound rising out of the dense into the more elastic, the sound travels with increased rapidity reaching the ear in about one-third the time as the reverse.

Here the musical professor ceased questioning, and I asked:—

Q. What is light?

A. Before answering any questions on this subject, would it not be better for the uninitiated to give an anatomical analysis of the structure of the eye, since without that the subject is but imperfectly understood? Either you or I will do this.

Q. I shall be very glad if you would give us your ideas of the anatomical structure of the human eye, and especially with reference to the recent discoveries of Helmholtz in relation to the structure of the retina?

A. This gentleman you so often quote is quite strange to me. I will be glad if you will tell me of him.

I here explained to the controller the substance of what I knew respecting Helmholtz and his labours, and asked:—

Q. Please to confine yourself to a popular description of the human eye, unless you are acquainted with Helmholtz's theories?

A. I know nothing of either the gentleman, his theories, or his works. The human eye is convex, in front of which the spherical cornea is placed. It is inclosed in three, or, as is not generally acknowledged, four coats, the sclerotic, the choroid, and the retina, which is not really a coat, but merely an expansion of the optic nerve. On the outer side of the sclerotic is a coat covering even the cornea, which is known in medicine as the adnata or conjunctiva. The choroid coat is within the sclerotic, and is of a dark brown colour known as the pigmentum nigrum, to absorb all unnecessary waves of light. First we will take the cornea, or window of the eye, a laminated, transparent, talc-like substance within which enclosed in a tunic is the aqueous humor; behind that is the iris, which acts as a diaphragm, cutting off all the outer rays, which would otherwise enter the pupil. The crystalline lens is a convex lens, or a double convex lens, more convex in the part which is situated in the vitreous humor, which fills the large cavity of the eye, collects the rays of light which enter the pupil, and being focalised there are photographed on the retina, which being set in motion by the rays of light which enter the eye,—not those which reflect the object—acts as a stimulus to the optic nerve, which carries a sense of feeling to the brain. The eye no more sees than does an instrument made by the optician; it only reflects and photographs the objects. I am not sure that this is a very clear explanation. I can better answer your questions respecting the structure of that organ.

Q. I shall be glad to give the company an explanation of the structure of the eye, using various diagrams for the purpose. Your description is very clear as a merely verbal one, but illustrations will be very serviceable. Will you please to inform us if it be your desire to have optics, drawing, or clairvoyant letter-reading next week—that is if it be convenient for you to meet us?

A. For my own part, I prefer these subjects to any others, but I am willing to be guided by you. I have been thinking, and have come to the conclusion, of trying to write in the light. I could then give you many diagrams illustrating the meaning of several things I mention. The dark is only necessary now to prevent the thoughts of the medium being too active and interfering with me. I have some other plans for future proceedings, but will not mention them now.

Up to the time of this séance, all replies by the hand of the medium were written in darkness, the questions being written and the replies read by me in light. During all subsequent séances, both the questions and answers were written in the light.

A PUZZLE TO JOURNALISTS.—The Echo Rochelais of the 24th March last, and several other journals, tell readers that at Esnandes, the Savineaus—father, mother, and two daughters, the elder fourteen and always ailing—have been disturbed by noises on walls and partitions, and on the bedstead of the ailing girl; and by discordant sounds as if made by a hoarse parrot, there being nothing visible to account for such noises; they have been heard every evening and night for a month past. Hundreds of curious people come to inquire. Sceptics go away vouching for the facts; some had thought to have found out a trick to draw money, but no one knows of any being asked for, taken, or given. Spiritists have come who asked questions in their way, and have, in their way, received answers. Among the visitors were a couple of gens d'armes, sent by the authorities, but the only result of their coming was a louder continuance of the noises, and a parody by some wag, at their expense, of a popular song. M. le Procureur de la République, happening to be at Esnandes, called to investigate, but while he was there nothing transpired. Strange that all ceased upon the ailing daughter going for a few days to Saint-Owen; but thither the noises followed her! And now on her return to Esnandes the noises there have come again!—Revue Spirite.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXIV.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

"In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." We do not hesitate to hang a fellow man, piously reading the burial service to him—not over him—when the drop is ready to fall—on the testimony of three witnesses. In a recent case the hope of a certain resurrection was three times repeated to one, standing on a drop which refused to "launch him into eternity," and his blessed immortality was mercifully commuted to a not particularly blessed penal servitude. The fact, however, remains that when the machine works, we do send our erring brethren to the blessed immortality on the testimony of "two or three witnesses."

Well, there is enough testimony in most numbers of "LIGHT" to prove any fact on which life or death might depend. In every number is given a list of witnesses whose word would not be doubted in any court of justice. The testimony is absolutely overwhelming—yet great numbers cannot believe without personal examination, and many will not even credit their own senses.

An iron ring on a man's wrist—a solid ring which will not go over his hand—is a rather stubborn fact. Knots on an endless cord are stubborn facts. Writing between slates firmly fastened to each other is a stubborn fact. Materialisations of recognised spirit friends, under test conditions, are stubborn facts. But there are bigots quite as stubborn as the facts, and there are "falsely so-called" men of science who refuse not only to accept, but even to examine them.

In this state of things—men shutting their eyes for fear they may see something which may change their opinions—what can we do but go on giving the testimony to those who are willing to receive it. Naturally the number increases. Each witness brings more. Each medium of the phenomena is the means of convincing hundreds, and in some cases thousands. Mr. Eglinton, for example, has given his wonderful séances from the Ganges to the Mississippi. Spiritualism is to-day a growing power from California to Australia.

Not an opinion, not a theory, not a faith. Spiritualism is a science based on facts—facts which men can see, hear, feel and examine. And solid facts lead to irresistible conclusions. The man who once witnesses the common phenomena of Spiritualism is not the same man the day after that he was the day before. A new element has been added to his mentality. A new fact has come into his life. Whatever his faith may have been, the knowledge of a continued existence makes an immense change in thought and feeling.

Mrs. J. R. Newton, widow of the healing medium, well known to many English Spiritualists, writes to Mrs. Williams, editress of the New York Beacon Light:—"I have seen in your séances the materialisation and dematerialisation of spirit forms, and on several occasions have seen and conversed with my husband, Dr. Newton. Perfectly natural in form and feature, he could be readily recognised by any one who knew him in earth-life and his identity established beyond the least shadow of doubt."

Wealth has its conveniences and its uses. It may be difficult to see the justice of being a millionaire, with all the misery of outcast London around us, but we are somewhat reconciled to the massing of money in the hands of men who make a good use of it. A wealthy Bostonian has provided a spiritual temple, a rich Philadelphian left money to be expended in spiritual investigation by a learned university, and now one of the millionaires of San Francisco proposes to build a more magnificent church or temple for the Golden City on the Pacific.

Lulu, the "Georgia Wonder Girl," is astonishing scientific men in America by the extraordinary manifestations of force in her presence. A strong man holds a little rod in his hands. She touches the rod with her finger and it jerks him all over the room with irresistible power. A man sits in a chair, and, when she takes his hands, man and chair are raised in the air. Three or four men hold the chair, and, when she touches it with her finger, it drags them about the room. Scientific examiners are useful in testifying to the facts, but they are utterly at a loss as to how they are accomplished.

That solid bodies rise into the air, float about, and pass through other solid bodies, contrary to what are called the laws of gravitation and cohesion, are facts familiar to every investigator of Spiritualism. A table, weighing a hundred pounds—a pianoforte weighing three hundred—rise from the floor, and remain suspended in the air with equal facility. The late Sergeant Cox testified that a quantity of fresh flowers—"a cart load," he said—came into his library when every door and window was fastened. In similar ways "the well-known laws of nature" are violated in every physical science.

Where is Blairlodge? All I know of it is that there is a Blairlodge School Magazine, and that the school has a debating society, which discusses and decides by vote such propositions as: "That the Latin authors wrote the nonsense they did for the express purpose of annoying posterity." On this the House divided. For the motion, nine; against, two: majority for, seven. The emotions of the ghosts of the Latin authors may be imagined.

At a later meeting the motion was, "That this House recognises the existence of certain unexplained forces manifesting themselves in the phenomena called Spiritualism." Three spoke for, and thirteen against the motion, and all voted in the negative—not one even admitting that there are occult forces in nature which scientific men ought to examine.

Occult forces! Forces which can write answers to questions in Latin, Greek, Italian, and Spanish between two slates firmly locked together, while held in the hand! Just consider what such a fact, substantiated by adequate testimony, implies! The combination of such force, controlled by such intelligence, means being, thought, action—the elements of individuality. Psychography is one of the best possible proofs of spirit existence and spirit power, and every thoughtful man who gets one example of psychography—writing under proper test conditions—necessarily becomes a Spiritualist.

The future of Spiritualism depends upon the spirits and their power of finding or developing mediums. In some degree also it depends upon the fidelity and humanity of Spiritualists. What we truly value we wish others to enjoy.

It is natural to have some curiosity respecting the manners of the spirit world, but spirits do not seem able to give us much information, because it hath not "entered into the heart of man to conceive" any proper idea of its enjoyments. One spirit said, "You have no words and no analogies, by which we can describe or picture the spirit life." An American medium is inspired by some spirit to say:—

"I had already learned that kindred spirits, those who truly love each other, do not need the language of tongues, the clasping of hands, the embracing of forms to express or to satisfy their love. But there is a delightful sensation of peace, of rest, of satisfaction and of joy in the heart of a spirit when in the presence of its beloved, that expresses more than any external manifestation can do. There is a feeling of oneness, a perfect blending of being that is indescribable and that is all-satisfying."

Perhaps the best thing we can have at present is a sort of Secularism pro tem. To make the best—truly the best—of this world may be as good a preparation as we can have for the next. The capacity of enjoyment is developed by exercise, as well as others.

A FATHER, at Lake Pleasant, said:—I am a banker, of Plymouth, fifteen hundred miles from here, in the north of Missouri. My son, just arrived at manhood, was thrown from his horse and killed. It was an overwhelming blow to his mother as well as to me. I have always been an Universalist, but I resolved to inquire if there was truth in what I had heard averred of Spiritualism. I went to New York and had sittings with the medium Mansfield; from him I came here, and have had sittings with Slade. I have been made happy. I know that my son lives. I know that he can communicate with us.—Facts.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

- A. G. W.—Next week.
C. DELOLME.—Will appear next week.
W. NUTTALL.—The letter has been forwarded as requested.
R. JONES.—"LIGHT" of April 4th, has been sent as requested.
DR. MUNROE.—Psychograph sent as requested. We shall be pleased to read the account to which you refer.
J. G. SPEED.—Thanks for the papers. Shall be pleased to hear from you.
T. W. STANFORD.—Your letter has been forwarded to the proper quarter.
H. W. S. K.—Your letter was delivered the day we received it. No doubt you will have heard direct by this time.
WANTED, the address of J. Hardy, late of 50, Lavender-road, Clapham Junction.
H. WELLS.—We will make inquiries and answer you in this column next week.
W. H. TERRY.—Letter of March 10th to hand. It will receive attention this week.
J. C. GORE.—Your dollar-note netted 3s. 8d. The books have been sent to the address given, but we see "LIGHT" goes to Boston. Is that right?
J. G. BRUCE.—The Psychological Review is dead. We send you a specimen copy of "LIGHT" in the hope that you will subscribe for that instead.
"THE PERFECT WAY."—This book is not, we are informed, out of print, as stated last week. Correspondents who wish to obtain the work can, therefore, do so.
M. THEOBALD.—We have again deferred your letter for a week. We will explain reason when we meet; meanwhile, please accept this intimation.
C. B. HANKEY.—We made every endeavour to comply with your wish. Our letter, however, making the arrangement with the vendor was returned through the Dead Letter Office.
J. WHYMARK.—We send you 100 copies of "LIGHT" for free distribution on same terms as those mentioned in the answer to J. Veitch.
J. J. M.—We do not intend to waste any more time over the matter. You have our acknowledgment: that must suffice. You have also been credited with 3s. for the last parcel of "LIGHT," and the balance has been posted to you.
H. WOOD.—We could not guarantee results, nor would Mr. Eglinton do so. Personally, we think you would do well to pay him a visit. Very few do so who do not get good results. We will make the inquiry you wish.
TO SPIRITUALISTS IN BRADFORD.—A gentleman residing in Bradford desires to join some good circle. We shall be pleased if any of our subscribers in that town will enable us to introduce our friend.
J. RUMBLE.—The proper person to apply to for aid in the matter you mention is the Secretary of the London Spiritualist Alliance, 62, Granville Park, S.E. We have sent you another parcel of 200 copies of "LIGHT" for distribution.
MISS GLYNN.—Zöllner's "Transcendental Physics" has been forwarded as requested. Did you not get "Animal Magnetism"? It was sent upon your first application. With reference to your last question you had better apply direct to Mr. Eglinton.
W. C. LOCKERY.—Our experience has always been that "exposers" do much to attract attention to the subject, inasmuch as, their own attempts being so lame, people are set thinking. If you could distribute back numbers of "LIGHT" we will gladly send you a selected parcel.
J. VEITCH.—We send you a second parcel of 200 copies of "LIGHT" on the understanding that they are wisely circulated amongst those who are anxious to know something of Spiritualism, and not thrust upon people indiscriminately. Many thanks for your kind letter. We are only too glad to help forward any judicious effort.
INDIA.—We have received a Post-office order from India for 10s. 10d., but no advice has yet reached us with respect to it. If intended as a subscription to "LIGHT," for one year, the rate for that country is 15s. 2d. per annum. Will our foreign subscribers always kindly advise us of all remittances they may make, otherwise great confusion ensues.
OUR thanks are due to some friend for sending us marked copies of the Christian Herald and the Christian Chronicle. We are always glad to receive copies of papers and magazines containing allusions to Spiritualism. Even if not used in connection with "LIGHT" our friends may rest assured their trouble has not been for naught.
M. E.—Will be used next week. Your experiences are interesting, and will be useful to others. There has, undoubtedly, been a good deal of loose investigation, and many of the records have been looser still. Latterly, however—say during the past two years—a marked improvement in these respects has been noticeable, and we think that you may take the records that have appeared in "LIGHT" during that period without even the traditional grain of salt. We are exceedingly careful as to what we admit.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates medianimic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE PRAISE OF OUR LADY OF MAY.

ONE OF THE SWEETEST OF THE CHILDREN OF THE ALMIGHTY FATHER.

[From the unpublished MSS. of the late Mrs. Howitt Watts.]

Walking along the road of Life, my soul began to bless and to praise our Lord, the Creator, for His Holy Virgin Daughter, the Lady of Spring, whom He each year sendeth to us upon earth.

The bright and gloriously arrayed Lady May, whose tenderhands are instinct with magic of life, and whose every touch, whose every breath calleth forth glory and beauty; whose breathing is odorous of Heaven; whose deep blue eyes gaze out of the skies full of benediction; whose warm, translucent tears make the earth to rejoice instead of to mourn, as do the tears of mortals; whose soft, warm, odorous bosom holdeth within its recesses generations of yet unawakened life; whose light and dancing feet moving along harmoniously call forth myriads of gentle and fair children of the hours, blossoms and buds, and green leaves, for the sustenance, healing, and blessing of animals and of man; and whose shining brow is crowned with the heavy coronal of snowy and roseate bloom until the breezes are overlaid with fragrance from opal dawn until dewy eve.

Yea, my love towards this fair Angel of God, whose radiance reneweth the gladness of youth even within the slowly throbbing heart of age, so drew me out of mys elf, that I cried aloud unto my God, and unto hers, blessing Him with a threefold blessing for her presence amongst men; for that foretaste of the joys of eternal youth and of a heavenly paradise, which her sweet creation maketh evident unto man, and of which she hath ever from the dawn of time been the earnest and sure promise. For whence she came must very many more like unto herself abide, making most joyous the blissful courts of the House of God, and preparing yet unborn sweetness for the countless coming generations of men, be they inspired poets or unlettered clowns, for verily, she is no respecter of persons though she be so mighty an enchantress and daughter of the glorious Creator of the World. Yea, she is bounteous because she, in degree, is like unto her Creator.

"O, thou best beloved of the fair daughters of the Sun! Thou golden-haired Lady of the May," I cried out, in my rapture, I would kiss the traces of thy virginal footsteps whilst I pluck handfuls of the white, fragrant lilies—the symbols of thy fair self—which spring up beneath thy feet filled with the flame of vernal life,

What riches of heart and of imagination hast thou not for ever been bestowing upon mankind at each joyous time of thy advent along the circling, ceaseless cycles of the ages? Who can contemplate and compute the depths of thy tenderness, of thy evernascent splendours of blossoming promises of fruition? Thou passest away—yet only for a season!

Though thou withdrawest thyself within the veil of another kind of beauty, we know full well that thou goest but to return again in an eternal youthfulness, that thy festival may be a lasting promise to the world. It is a song that hath its appointed pauses, only through the consummate art of the Divine Artist, in order that we may yearn with tender languishing for its recurrent sweetness;—as a picture to be repainted in the imagination by Memory with even yet more beauty, because it is pathetic, than was perceived in the brilliancy of its living presence.

Yea, thou dearly beloved and bounteously dowered Daughter of the Sun, we yearn unto thee and extol thy loveliness as sign and symbol given forth by the Divine Artist of His yet more wonderful and gloriously translucent Proceeding—the Spirit of Light and of Love, the Holy Ghost, the Spirit, and the Bride!

Even, as in days of yore, thy votaries went forth, O Spring, with pipes and with merry shawms, with garlands and with dancing, with sacred cakes and with wine, and with incense and with troops of fair white-robed youths and maidens into the lush, teeming meadows, and fresh-leaved and far-spreading forests, there to worship Thee, with libations, and offerings and joyous hymns—so do but let my spirit worship God Almighty, thy Holy Parent, as spirit within thee,—most fair, most tender revelation of Divine bounteousness and beauty. Let my white-robed and garlanded thoughts make a merry sound of rejoicing in thy praise, and magnify to the glory of thy Creator thy soft white veil of clouds, thy coronal of blossoms of all fruitful and sweet-scented trees and herbs; thy musical voice of all birds, beasts and insects, of waters, of rustling and softly murmuring breezes, and of the pattering of showers—thy many coloured raiment woven of the most glorious colours of Heaven and of earth, and of the sea, all thy bridal bravery!

O vernal Messenger from on high; Iris of Heaven; Comforter of the heart of mortality! as thou leanest out of the windows of thy palace of Heaven, smiling upon the grey-garmented mortals of earth, thou dost verily draw ever upwards, and ravish away our hearts from earthly things whispering unto us the word—IMMORTALITY!

"THE PASSAGE OF MATTER THROUGH MATTER."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you allow me to correct an error in your to-day's issue, of small importance but for the use which Dr. Wyld has made of it? He quotes me as saying, with respect to the ring-question, that the verdict of Mr. Maskelyne and that of Professor Barrett and myself were "entirely coincident." What I did say was that they were "entirely concordant," which has the advantage of being English as well as accurate.—Yours obediently,

A Reading Room and Book Depot for Spiritualists.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am glad to hear there is some idea of establishing a depot for the sale of spiritualistic literature, for I feel certain there is a great want of such a place, as well as of other facilities for enabling those who feel an interest in the subject to obtain information with regard to Spiritualism.

When my attention was first called to this subject, now about eighteen months since, through accidentally meeting with "A New Basis" left on the table in a drawing-room in a hydropathic establishment, I was at a great loss how to obtain any further information, and though a complete sceptic at the time, the subject seemed to me to be worth inquiry.

I was in London the following Christmas, and seeing the addresses of 4, New Bridge-street, and 4, Ave Maria-lane, on a spiritualistic publication, I made an expedition into the City (I well remember it, on a cold wintry morning), hoping at least to be able to see some books and buy them if they looked worth the reading. I went first to New Bridge-street, expecting to find a bookseller's shop, but there was nothing but a café, where formerly, I believe, the publishing business had been carried on in an upper storey. I then proceeded to the publishers in Ave Maria-lane, but could get no books or information there, excepting that a book I inquired for was not yet published. Rather discouraged, I left London the next day, and spent the ensuing four months at St. Leonards and Bournemouth, but curiously enough the subject was not altogether allowed to drop out of my mind through accidental encounters with people who were interested in it, and at the latter place I met a lady who was a Spiritualist and who lent me a copy of "LIGHT," in which I found a notice that books were to be bought and information given at 3, Great James-street. I went again to London in the beginning of June, and the day after my arrival I called at the office of "LIGHT" in Great James-street. There I fortunately found the editor (yourself), and through following your advice, I became shortly after thoroughly convinced of the great, and I may say, blessed truths of Spiritualism. Had I, however, put off my visit for another week or two I should have found this place likewise closed, and should, I am convinced, have abandoned the search in disgust. Though very happy in my new belief, I found myself somewhat solitary. I thought it my duty to inform my nearest relations and friends of my experiences, but was met with such incredulity and indifference that I determined never again to mention the subject to them; should they be moved as I was by a desire to know the truth, they will know where to come for assistance and sympathy. In this dearth of spiritualistic companionship I determined to become a member of the London Spiritualist Alliance, which I did. I knew nothing about its proceedings, but I thought there would be a place of meeting for members, where they could exchange ideas and relate experiences, as well, perhaps, have an opportunity of seeing spiritualistic literature. I found, however, nothing of the sort, nor had I any opportunity for meeting Spiritualists except at the periodical conversaziones given by the Alliance at St. James's Hall. I hope something in the way I have hinted at may shortly be considered by the Society; it would be a great boon to many. I must apologise for troubling you with so long and egotistical a letter, but my experience is, I feel sure, only that of one among scores, and I hope that many do not give up the search after truth in consequence of the difficulty they find in obtaining literature and information.—With kind regards, believe me, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

M. B.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In your issue of the 11th inst. I ventured to trouble your readers for information as to whether there was any public library, reading-room, or depot for the sale of books in connection with Spiritualism in London, but I regret to find my query has been unanswered, and this leaves me no choice but to conclude that I was correct in my supposition. Such a state of affairs is a disgrace to the movement, and is not warranted to inspire subscribers with the belief that it is a growing power.—I am, sir, yours faithfully, Charing Cross Hotel.

AN INQUIRING STRANGER.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Personally, I am adverse to proselytising, but I think the weakest point in the cause is that those seeking to investigate the matter have great difficulty in obtaining information, or suitable literature. The latter will be met, I trust, by the proposed depot, for which the "Dissemination Fund" was started. I think it is a disgrace to the cause that, at least in the Metropolis, they are not able to secure a good house in a central position, where those interested could meet to discuss, and where a good reference library and the current papers could be seen, and where strangers on introduction by a member could obtain information. When members are willing to wager their thousands with a Labouchere could not some of them be persuaded to give their tens for such an object? I do not belong to the London Spiritualist Alliance, as I do not quite understand what their aim and object is, but would gladly do so if they would turn their attention to some such scheme as I have roughly outlined.

19th April, 1885.

["An Inquiring Stranger," "M.B.," and "W." undoubtedly touch upon a great need. We have often ourselves been puzzled at the attitude of Spiritualists in these matters. It seems beyond comprehension. We shall, however, be violating no confidence when we announce (unofficially, at present) that the London Spiritualist Alliance have taken the first step towards supplying some of the necessities of the case. A small room has been taken close to Charing Cross where the library will be placed, council meetings held, and where strangers may occasionally, in the evening, meet with one or more of the officials. This is all they can do at present. They have pledged themselves to live within their income, and a membership of 150 does not allow much margin for rent, gas, attendance, &c., after providing for eight or ten conversaziones—a popular feature of the Alliance which the Council do not think it wise to curtail for any other purpose whatever.

The rooms opened by the Psychological Press in Great James-street, referred to by "M.B.," were closed because one individual could not keep them open longer at his own expense. Small, and inconvenient of access though they were, they proved very useful, and the daily attendance clearly showed the need which existed for such a central office. This was felt so important that a few months ago "A Barrister" started a "Dissemination Fund" to provide a permanent depot for the sale and diffusion of spiritual literature. £300 were asked for, but not more than £120 are up to now available for the purpose. This is discouraging, but it has been determined to carry out the proposal as far as means will allow, and a modification of the original plan has been adopted, which in some respects, especially as far as publicity goes, is some improvement on the scheme as first proposed. In connection with this "Dissemination Fund," rooms on the ground floor of the same building in which the London Spiritualist Alliance are located, have been secured for use as a depot for the sale and distribution of spiritual literature.

Both these moves are steps in the right direction, but neither the Alliance nor the Psychological Press can do anything like the work that is waiting to be done; and although what they individually purpose doing is good as far as it goes, it does not, in either case, go far enough. In no other city in the world do Spiritualists allow their work to be carried on under such cramped conditions. Abroad, there are not a few instances of generous Spiritualists having contributed large sums for the effective carrying on of spiritualistic work. One man alone, in Boston, gave upwards of £40,000 for building a Spiritual Temple, and, on an appeal being made for a fund of £5,000 to furnish the place, sums varying in amount from £1,000 to £10 were at once freely subscribed. Now we learn that another friend of the cause is building in San Francisco a still more beautiful building for the use of the Spiritualists in the City of the Golden Horn. Nor are these munificent gifts confined to America. In Australia, and frequently on the Continent, large sums have been given for use in spiritualistic work, while in England alone, the active workers are expected to transact the business of the movement without even a home or proper assistance. Let us make a little confession. It is somewhat personal, and although we have often been asked to state the facts we have always shrunk from doing so. Possibly, however, the statement may awaken a few of our friends to a sense of the responsibility which the possession of a great truth entails upon them.

Although "LIGHT" is worked by a public company it is no secret that the shareholders generally took up the shares more from a wish to benefit the cause than from any desire to receive dividends. From the commencement, as is usually the case, it has been uphill work, and had it not been that the directors and officials were, one and all, thoroughly imbued with a desire to work heartily and diligently for Spiritualism, combined with the generosity of a few friends and well-wishers in subscribing a Sustentation Fund to cover the loss, the company, and with it "LIGHT," would long since have been things of the past. Everyone connected with "LIGHT" looked upon the work as a labour of love, and department after department of the business of the paper was voluntarily undertaken in that spirit. With all newspapers the direction of affairs necessarily falls on one man, but in no other instance are we aware that a single individual is expected not only to take the general control, but also to perform the whole of the detail work besides. That, however, was the case during the year 1884 with "LIGHT." In addition to editing the paper—a task in itself sufficient to occupy the energies of one man—the book-keeping, correspondence, and numerous other duties connected with a newspaper fell to our lot. Such a work ordinarily finds employment for a staff of clerks, and the position of matters is only emphasised by the fact that we had no means of providing even a single room in which we could do our work, but we had to execute it when, where, and how we could. The result of the year's working was published last week and we are exceedingly glad that it was so encouraging. But we feel constrained to say that it was attained by sacrifices and exertion on our part, the like of which neither we, nor two, nor even three persons should be called upon to bear alone; and, to tell the truth, considering the few facilities at command wherewith to work the paper, we are astonished that it did so well. This year, our friend and colleague, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, at great personal sacrifice and inconvenience, undertook a portion of the clerical work, but it is, we hold, unfair to him and ourselves that we should be obliged to perform mere clerk's work when our time could be more profitably employed in other directions.

We wish it to be clearly understood that in making this statement none of those concerned will see it until it is in type; that we (the editor) are alone responsible for it, and that our object is simply to draw attention to the fact that, to our personal knowledge, the London Spiritualist Alliance is similarly crippled, and the burden of the work cast upon a few, when, if Spiritualism is worth anything, they should be supported by many willing hands and hearts. The same might be said of the "Dissemination Fund." For ourselves we say nothing. We are glad to do the work, and will continue to perform it so long as strength and opportunity will permit; but at the same time we hope these anomalies will not be permitted, by Spiritualists at large, to continue much longer in regard to other workers. One thing, however, is certain—that it is impossible to "make bricks without straw," and although the work or a portion of it may be done, yet the whole movement must and does suffer because of the insufficiency of the means provided.

There are a few who have loyally and generously contributed according to their means. They have the satisfaction of knowing that to them is largely due the fact that this paper exists; that there is a society doing good work, and that the literature of the subject is not altogether neglected. But while rendering due acknowledgment to them, we wish we could fire the hearts of the many with a little righteous zeal for their fellows. Open doors for work exist in abundance; there are workers willing to devote strength and time to it if enabled to do so; the one thing needful is a little more practical sympathy on the part of Spiritualists at large. We trust our friends will bear with us in making this statement; we shall not refer to it again.—Ed. of "LIGHT."

What is the Use of Spiritualism?

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It was my intention some time ago, when the subject cropped up in your interesting paper, at the instigation of, I think, "Ebor," to write to you to point out that, as far, at least, as I know, an answer has never been given to the question, "What, after all, is the use of Spiritualism?" There are many persons like myself who have taken up the subject earnestly, and, having come to a certain point, drop it, not from any carelessness, but from the fact that it seems a metaphysical cul-de-sac. When it was asked, has anything not known by, and of general interest to, mankind ever been discovered by the so-called spirits? two instances, and those not of the most convincing type, were given by General Drayson; while, on the religious side of Spiritualism, as far as I have seen, there has been no improvement of either doctrine or morals, and, indeed, it surprised me to read in "LIGHT" that the experiences of Judge Edmonds were now considered by Spiritualists to be somewhat out of date. I must say that, for myself, his writings are much more elevating than this continual discussion about materialisations, and minute details concerning the temperature of a "portrait figure" in a dark séance. It is this absence of satisfaction which makes many, like Mr. Haweis, after having proved for themselves that there is intelligence apart from matter, drop the subject for ever, or incline to the belief that we only have to do with an elemental of lower intelligence than ourselves and that a further pursuit of the subject must be detrimental to themselves.

Let me give an instance of the curious attitude of Spiritualism. When first interested in the subject, I, with some other friends, paid a visit to a well-known and deservedly-respected Spiritualist (Mr. Keulemans), and, in the course of a most interesting conversation, he told us, and I think I remember perfectly what he said, for it struck us much at the time, and formed the subject for a long discussion, that "John King" was sent by him (or a friend, I forget which) to Australia to get an answer to a question, and that he performed the double journey in twenty-four hours or so. Now, being perfectly convinced of the integrity of the relator of this fact, the question which naturally arises in one's mind is, why, when England, and indeed the whole of the civilised world yearned for tidings of the true fate of Gordon in Khartoum, did not the Spiritualists once and for all place their belief beyond the reach of question, and tell a waiting world the news?

But no, it was not because Spiritualism, as such, was a piece of trickery, but because the intelligence of man is higher than that to which we appeal in séances. Has "John King" enlightened us as regards the details of life in the reign of Elizabeth: Has "Joey" or "Irresistible" ever told us one word which can really put aside our doubts as to the reality of a terminated earthly existence?

It is a hard subject to treat of fully, but the main question may be put thus: Having arrived at a belief in the reality of the so-called spiritual manifestations, is it worth while risking one's health (for there is a risk, which I know too well to be the fact) and incur loss of time considering a subject which can, as far as one can judge, never bring satisfaction?—I am sir, yours faithfully,

3, Hare Court, The Temple.

A. G. W.

A Record of a Private Séance.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I was recently present at two séances in a private house, and I think some account of what took place at them might interest your readers. One of the difficulties which meet the inquirer into spiritual phenomena is that of proving the identity of the spirit professing to communicate. This is not from any lack of evidence on the subject, but from the fact that such proofs of identity are chiefly to be met with at private séances, and are very seldom, therefore, communicated to the general public. I was spending a few days recently at the country house of Mr. W., in company with a Mr. and Mrs. S., like myself, Spiritualists, and we were joined by Mr. Eglington, the well-known medium, who came on a visit of a couple of days. On the evening of the first day he asked whether we would like to have a short séance, a proposition which was gladly assented to. We, therefore, went into the library, which has a parquet floor, and took our seats round a large lloo table. The company assembled were—Mr. and Mrs. W., Mr. and Mrs. S., Mr. Eglington, and myself. We placed our hands on the table, and the gas being turned out, raps were heard shortly after on different parts of the table. Mr. W. then inquired, by means of the alphabet, who wished to communicate, and received for answer the name of his wife's father, from whom she has often received messages. This gentleman was lord of the manor in a small village in the West of England, and passed to the other world about eight years since. The first message was of an ordinary character; but the next was a very curious one. It was as follows: "I wish you to send five pounds to cripple 'B.," the alphabet being called over at every letter, three raps giving the signal when the right one was named. Mrs. W., seemed equally surprised with the rest of the company, and told us that "B." was the name of a poor cripple in the village in whom her father had formerly taken great interest. The power, I suppose, being by this time stronger, the control, "Joey," was able to give the other messages by speaking, and told Mrs. W. that her father (whom he mentioned by name) wished the money to be sent to this poor man for the purpose of buying him a wheeled chair, the one he had previously had being completely worn out. Many details followed, and "Joey" spoke to the rest of us about private matters concerning ourselves. He then said he should like us very much to meet again the following evening, when we should be more en rapport, and might hope for even more striking manifestations. The next evening, therefore, we assembled about nine o'clock in the same room, the only difference being that two of the gentlemen moved from the drawing-room a very large and handsome musical-box on a stand. It had four sets of cylinders, and, when either of these was wound up, it continued playing all the tunes, I think, right on each cylinder till it had run down. We sat, as before, with our hands simply placed flat on the large and heavy table, with the gas alight. Mr. W. wound up the musical-box, and in a few minutes the table began moving, first in one direction and then another, and even answered "Yes" and "No" to questions by tilting as well as by raps. As soon as one tune was finished the musical-box ceased playing, instead of going on as it ought to have done. Mr. W., therefore, asked if the control wished to manage it himself, and received an answer in the affirmative as well as the instruction to put the gas out. This he did, and during the remainder of the séance, "Joey" set the music going whenever he felt inclined. Mr. Eglington became entranced, and "Joey" then held a long conversation with Mr. and Mrs. W. concerning the money to be sent for the chair, and the people living in the village, the messages coming from Mrs. W.'s father as before, speaking of them by name, and mentioning the most minute particulars of their characters and appearance, which could have only been known by one on intimate terms with them. All these particulars were confirmed by Mrs. W. later on. He also talked to the rest of us about personal matters, and I was favoured in a singular manner. A dear spirit friend of mine, who I knew was present, was able to make his presence known to me, not only by touching me on the forehead and hands in a way I can always recognise, but even by speaking audibly to me. In answer to my question, whose voice it was I heard close to my ear, he said his own name distinctly, and "Yes" when I asked him something else. This took place while "Joey" was conversing with Mrs. S. Several times lights appeared moving about, not only a pretty little flickering light something like a firefly, but a luminous mass as big as a man's hand, with another bright light on its left side; this once came close to my face and floated about in different directions. I often felt the usual cool breeze across my hands, and Mr. S., who was sitting next me, and is strongly mediumistic, said he could see a form between himself and me. The séance lasted about an hour and a-half, and was terminated by a tune from the musical-box, which died slowly away as "Joey" said good-bye to each of us.

A few days later on I had a visit from Mrs. W., bringing a letter to show me from Mrs. B., the mother of the poor cripple, thanking her in the most grateful terms for the generous gift, which she said was most opportune, as the chair which the cripple was wheeled about in was completely worn out, and it was dangerous for him to attempt to go out in it. I append the names and addresses of those who took part in these séances, not, of course, for publication, and I remain, dear sir, yours faithfully,

The Difficulties of Inquirers. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—When Mr. Watson's first letter appeared in your columns I was tempted to reply to it, but imagining that he would receive many offers of abler assistance than mine, I refrained. This time, however, I will not keep silence, for three reasons. Firstly, because I was for a long period in the same frame of mind as Mr. Watson now appears to be; secondly, because my experience of the difficulty of personally obtaining conclusive phenomenal evidence is identical with his; thirdly, and chiefly, because I can point out to him a very simple way in which, by patience and perseverance (for here, as elsewhere, there is no royal road to knowledge), he can bring home to himself the conviction that there is, beyond a doubt, an intelligence wholly and altogether outside ourselves. Further than this I have as yet myself scarcely attained, and cannot be the guide of another; but I think he will find this enough to strive for at the outset, and having achieved this will be able to work his way onwards unassisted.

I became personally acquainted with Spiritualism at a very striking dark séance; I was then convinced that no human hands had produced what I saw, felt, and heard, and that there was some hitherto unknown force present.

Being then in London, with Spiritualist friends around me, plenty of time at my disposal, an insatiable desire to learn more of, and an intense longing to be able to believe in, the unspeakable blessing of intercourse with dear ones beyond the veil, I yet went from medium to medium, from circle to circle, for nearly three years without advancing a single step!

Wherever I heard of good séances to which money would admit me I went, only to find each and all utterly unsatisfactory. Were they for physical manifestations, there were no precautions taken against fraud. Did they sit for psychical phenomena with clairvoyants, there was a vagueness and indefiniteness about all statements and descriptions, a glad seizing of trifling coincidences, a delighted enlarging on any small prophecy that had been fulfilled, a triumphant holding up of one true thing to the oblivion of a dozen that were false, that finally so wearied me I gave up all such researches, and endeavoured to obtain an entrée to some private circle where a higher class of mind in the sitters would promise better things, and the suspicion of money interests be eliminated. I heard of many such circles. To one the conditions of admission were strict, but I would gladly have accepted them had I not been told I should probably have to wait months until a vacancy occurred. As to the others, they were formed by advanced Spiritualists for their own satisfaction. The admission of a stranger would, I was informed, retard and perhaps prevent the development of the desired phenomena, and I could neither wish nor expect any one to make such a sacrifice of their time and patience for my sake.

I therefore resolved to try and develop mediumship in myself, and appealed to a lady of whom I had heard much as a medium of the highest class, and possessing the power of developing mediumistic gifts in others. From her I received much sympathy and great encouragement. She told me of most blessed and wondrous "revelations" and "manifestations" occurring to others, which might and probably would also occur to me; I therefore put myself unreservedly under her guidance and remained so for months. Now, that this lady was one of the most single-minded of women, that she believed, with an intensity of conviction nothing could shake, in her own wonderful gifts, and the importance of all manifestations and revelations given through her, as coming from the highest sources—I am fully persuaded, but I neither perceived in myself the faintest sign of any abnormal power (though she continually pointed out to me what she called evidence of such), nor did I receive from her one iota of anything that could be reasonably called evidence of the continued existence of those passed from among us. In fact, the interference of any outside power appeared to me to be, in her case, not proven. And now I come to that part of my experience which I think may be useful to Mr. Watson. Unable to obtain what I desired from or through any medium, I set to work without one. A relative of my own and two intimate friends, all interested in the investigation, sat with me at a small round table once a week on the same day, and at nearly the same hour, for the greater part of one winter. For a time we got nothing but "tilts," in which I placed little faith, feeling sure they can be produced by unconscious movements when several pairs of hands are engaged. But through these despised "tilts" came slowly conviction, first, of some intelligence possibly within ourselves, but of the action of which we were unconscious; secondly, of some intelligence wholly outside ourselves, which foretold trivial, but unexpected events, gave what we thought wrong answers to questions, but afterwards found were right; told us circumstances of which we could have had no previous knowledge, and often in which we had no interest, but which, on taking the trouble to investigate, we found were correct, &c., &c.

Moreover, the "tilts" were of various kind as the personalities supposed to be in converse with us, and singularly suggestive of the characteristics of the person they claimed to represent—a quick decided movement for the one, a slow methodical movement for another, an impatient and irregular tilting for a third, and so on. Lastly came the final triumph of our patience—raps! soft, weak, small sounds, but clear, distinct, and unmistakable. Through them we held a conversation with the intelligences; I received an incomprehensible message from a dead man I did not know to a sister of his, of whom I had never heard, and it having been delivered through a mutual friend, was found to be a most natural and apposite message under their circumstances. Stranger still, my friends sitting one day without me were informed of the death by an accident of an acquaintance of mine, whose name was quite unknown to them. So it was that I began to make some progress in the study of Spiritualism, and if Mr. Watson has time and patience enough to give this method a fair trial, he can convince himself in like manner.—I am, sir, yours obediently,

M. E.

Mr. Eglington and Materialisation Séances.

We have been requested to publish the following correspondence:—

DEAR MR. EGLINTON,—

Will it be convenient for you to give a séance for materialisation, one evening between Friday next and Wednesday week? A friend of mine, Dr. M., from the Cape of Good Hope, is anxious to see some spirit manifestations before he leaves London, which he intends doing on Wednesday, and I would like very much if you could give him the opportunity. I shall try and get one or two others to join us, my daughter and myself would also be present, and Mr. Younger has kindly consented to attend, and take charge of the circle. Others who may be present, know scarcely anything of the subject, and are sceptical, but I do not think their presence would hinder the manifestations, as they are earnest in wishing to know the truth.

I can make no arrangement, however, till I hear from you, whether you can give the sitting. Hoping to hear from you soon, with kindest regards,—I remain yours very sincerely, 99, Ledbury-road, Bayswater.

ANNE DARLING.

April 20th, 1885.

DEAR MRS. DARLING,—

I regret that I cannot accede to your request to give you the desired séance for materialisation. Lest I should be misunderstood, I will state my reason for this refusal. I hold that a medium is placed in a very responsible position, and that he has a right to satisfy, as far as he possibly can, those who come to him. Now, my experience, which is a varied one, leads me to the conclusion that no sceptic, however well-intentioned or honest, can be convinced by the conditions prevailing at a materialisation séance, and the result is further scepticism on his part, and condemnation of the medium. It is different when there is a harmonious circle of Spiritualists, who are advanced enough to witness such phenomena, and with whom I shall always be delighted to sit; but a neophyte must be prepared by other methods. If your friend cares to come to a slate-writing séance I shall be happy to arrange an hour on Monday or Tuesday, otherwise I must decline to sit for the reasons stated above, and which must commend themselves to you as to all thinking Spiritualists.

Believe me, yours sincerely,

6, Nottingham-place, W.

W. EGLINTON.

April 23rd, 1885.

DEAR MR. EGLINTON,—

Although I feel sorry for my friend's sake, I quite approve of your decision. It is quite right that outsiders should be made to understand that they cannot get admission to the "sacred mysteries" without due preparation on their own part, and that they cannot have manifestations at their beck and call.

I had my doubts about the prudence of your sitting for sceptics, but thought I would ask you, and now that I know your opinion, I shall in future be better able to advise others who wish to see these wonders. Too often these séances are made too common, and mere shows for the amusement of people who cannot appreciate or understand the sacredness of spirit communion.—Yours sincerely, 99, Ledbury-road.

CLAIRVOYANCE.—Rev. Dr. J. P. Newman says: "After medical men had failed with me, my wife took a lock of my hair to a lady in New York, said to be endowed with clairvoyance, for which she received no payment. This lady, my wife told me, held the hair in her hand, went into an apparent sleep, and presently murmured, 'Gall stones; he must take sweet oil and seidlitz powders.' Persuaded by my wife, I swallowed a quantity of sweet oil and took seidlitz powders with the effect of passing twenty-eight gall stones. This cause of my troubles had never been diagnosed by any of my doctors. I was soon well, and am now a hearty man. When the lady who brought me this good service died, objection was raised by some clergymen to performing the rites of burial over her body. I gladly accepted the duty, and over her coffin I publicly acknowledged my debt to her. No man can explain such a mysterious mental power; but that this woman had been given some force not possessed by most mortals I do not doubt."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE NATURAL AND THE SPIRITUAL BODIES.

(From the Spiritual Offering.)

The editor of the Spiritual Offering (Ottawa, Iowa) of March 21st., calling the attention of a correspondent belonging to one of the churches, to the words of St. Paul, "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body," reminds him that the text says that there is, not will be, a spiritual body; that numerous facts are on record demonstrative of the existence of the spiritual body; that such records have increased in later times, and are now of frequent occurrence. Such facts, he points out, demonstrate that the spiritual body may leave its material body without complete severance of the "silver cord," and return to it for a time, longer or shorter. He quotes instances, most recently reported.

From the Des Moines Register he takes this:—Mrs. Fossett, of Portland, Me., died on March 10th, after a very short illness, and her body was laid out. Late the same evening a dear friend came to take a farewell look at her. Sitting by her side, weeping and gazing at her face, she said, "Ah! where are you now?" Mrs. Fossett moved, turned a little on her side, and finally sat up! Her friend called in the family to hear her relate that it seemed to her that she had been in Heaven, feeling a happiness beyond expression; that she had met her mother and other departed friends. The voice here became faint, and, sinking back, she died, to return no more.

This from the Banner of Light:—On Monday, February 16th, John Wisholm, a Swede by birth, of Centre Township, Penn., was taken suddenly ill and apparently died. His family were overwhelmed with grief; his son threw himself upon him, embraced him, and implored him to speak, not to leave them without one word! Presently the father's eyes opened, his lips moved, and he said: "Oh, why call me back?" They administered restoratives, and when able he narrated what he had experienced. He said that after a first sinking sensation he saw what was occurring in the room, but could not speak; then all became dark, and he seemed to float between two forms invisible to him; then it grew lighter and lighter, until he saw two beautiful bright beings on either side of him, heard sweet music, and felt at peace. From this he was aroused by his son's voice, which seemed to draw him back through the darkness again and into his painful body. He lay in a weak state for two days and then finally left this world.

Lastly, this from the Auburn Gazette:—Thirty-four years ago, John Hurelle, a youth of sixteen, in Auburn, was pronounced by doctors to be dead, and every preparation was made for the funeral. On the morning of the day of burial, his mother, thinking she saw signs of life, had him removed from the coffin into bed. As this was being done he faintly said, "Let me —" and then stopped. He lay unconscious, his mother giving him liquid food from time to time, for eight months. Consciousness then returned, the first word he uttered being, "be," and then stopped, thus completing the sentence he began eight months before. This man is now fifty years of age. He is a shoemaker, working in Reilly and McGarr's shoe stores in Auburn. The coffin, of thirty-four years ago, is still kept by his brother. Questioned as to any experience he had during that eight months, he says that he seemed to be floating around; when he thought of a place he was immediately there. He saw his coffin, his mother, and his friends, but he could neither hear nor speak to them. He saw many deceased friends. Everything was bright and pleasant while he was out of his body, but the coming into it again was terrible.

The editor of the Spiritual Offering tells his correspondent that he thinks such facts are now more frequently recorded because men are giving more heed than ever before to the relation between the spiritual and the material, and because the nearness of the spirit-world is more generally recognised than heretofore.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXV.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

I do not see that advertising an exposé of Spiritualism by the American method of interviewing amounts to much. Mr. Maskelyne talks of exposing Mr. Slade in Bow-street. What he really did was to swear that the table used was a trick table, which was false, as any one may see who chooses to examine it. As for the writing, neither Mr. Maskelyne nor any one else has ever told us how it is done.

Again, if Maskelyne can explain or reproduce the manifestations, why has he never claimed the large rewards offered by the late Mr. Fowler, of Liverpool, by Signor Damiani, and by Mr. S. C. Hall? Not one challenge offered by Spiritualists has ever been accepted; not one reward has ever been claimed. So long as this is the case, what confidence can be placed in the mere advertising brags of newspaper interviewers?

No Spiritualist, who has been a careful investigator, can be troubled for a moment by such assertions. Every such investigator has seen scores, perhaps hundreds, of manifestations, which no conjurer could imitate. When Mr. Maskelyne will sit down with me at a table, let me clean two slates and place a bit of pencil between them, and then place his two hands with mine upon the slates until we hear the sound of writing, and I find the whole inside of one of them covered with a letter to me, in the handwriting of one I knew intimately in this life, signed with the name proper to such handwriting, and stating facts utterly unknown to Mr. Maskelyne, then, in such a case, he might be worth interviewing—though, as a matter of business, it would be only in the strictest confidence that he would tell how it was done.

Of course it is a folly to fancy that a professional conjurer knows more about the matter than any man of common-sense. But when we have the careful, continued, scientific investigations of two adepts in physical science like Crookes and Zollner and a dozen more, what do we want of a Maskelyne?

I agree with some of the critics of the Psychical Society. It seems to me that their method has been wrong. I think they should have begun by investigating, and confirming or exposing, the best known phenomena of Spiritualism. Thought-reading, apparitions, haunted houses, &c., might have followed. Of course it is a matter of taste or judgment—but I would have begun the investigation with rappings, the moving of objects, psychography, and so on, up to materialisation—examining and fighting each fact, and mercilessly exposing every fraud or falsehood. That, it seems to me, was what we wanted of such a society.

After all, the great obstacles to the reception of new facts and new ideas are mental inertia, habit, prejudice, and the utter want, in nine persons in ten, of a philosophic spirit. People have "made up" what they call their minds. Having accepted some theory of life and faith, they resolutely bar out all facts that threaten it. Dreading light, they draw down the blinds and close the shutters.

Next to a favourable presentation of the phenomena in literature, and perhaps better in some ways for exciting curiosity and provoking discussion, is such an attack upon Spiritualism as that made last year by Robert Buchanan in his novel, "The New Abelard." Of course, Mr. Buchanan burlesques it stupidly. But attending a séance, or even reading a fair account of one, might have been a disadvantage. When a man sets himself to abuse a creed, or a philosophy, or a system based on facts, the less he knows about either, the finer his scope for vituperation and misrepresentation.

But even the wildest misrepresentation or the most virulent and baseless abuse may have a good effect upon fair-minded, open-minded inquirers after truth. Such men say: "Why is this doctrine everywhere spoken against? How is it that intelligent and even profoundly scientific men believe in what is denounced as an idiotic imposture?" And the first impulse of every just man who hears any cause abused is to ascertain whether the abuse is well founded.

So far as I can judge from the reports in spiritualist journals in America, Europe, and the Colonies, the "Cause" of Spiritualism is very rapidly advancing, by which I mean that its facts are becoming more widely known. Facts hardly constitute a cause or a creed. Spiritualism is really a science to be investigated or studied, like astronomy or geology. It is not a faith, it is not a hope. Certainty supersedes both. We know there is a world of spirits. We know that the friends who have left us as to the earthly life, still live, still are able to talk with us and assure us of their loving care. We are as sure of this as we are of our own existence, and our "Cause" is simply and only the benevolent wish to bring this knowledge to all "whom it may concern."

I freely admit that religious people of several denominations may have more urgent motives for missionary efforts. It is natural that men who believe that tracts or preaching may save human souls from an eternal fiery hell, should put spare shillings and even pounds into the contribution box. Of course a man who believes that the destiny of every human soul has been foreordained from all eternity has no such motive. Why should a man try to save a soul predestined by its Maker to eternal perdition? Or why spend money or effort for those predestinated to eternal felicity?

A Spiritualist has, however, abundant motives to spread the knowledge of the truth. It is a cheerful science and helpful to humanity in many ways. It removes the terror of annihilation, and makes many welcome the change of death. The certainty of immortality gives new motives to purity and justice, kindness and benevolence. Can there be a grander stimulus to the attainment of all wisdom and virtue than to know ourselves immortal? Can all the sciences of the universe compare with this one science of THE LIFE TO COME?

Mrs. General Booth, of the sensational Salvation Army, has been preaching at the Town Hall, Kensington. She was announced in the War Cry, and on large ruddy posters, borne by sandwich men. Of course the large beautiful New Town Hall, opposite the High-street Station, was crowded, and the shilling for reserved seats and the collection paid expenses. A good general keeps a sharp outlook on his military chest and commissariat.

I doubt, however, whether Mrs. General Booth can draw as large a crowd as Major Pierson, who has been the medium of miracles of healing in the Potteries and later at Sheffield—where, we are told in many newspapers, the blind were restored to sight, the deaf heard, and lepers, if any came, with faith enough, were cleansed. It is clear enough that there has been much excitement—but the reporters are not quite agreed as to the miracles of healing. And if the "mesmeric" power of a dozen fervent Salvationists were anywhere gathered, ordered, and directed by a "healing medium" there is no doubt that miracles would be produced. The cures wrought in Australia some time ago by a Spiritualist were very remarkable. We had some instances in England, through Dr. Newton. There seems to be no doubt that in the fervour and concentration of united prayer at the Bethshans of Islington and Liverpool, many have been cured.

It has long been suspected by many, and known to some that successful revivalists were men and women who, perhaps unconsciously, exercised a strong mesmeric power—that converts are as really "psychologised" as the mesmerised performers of Madame Card. Of late this fact is being freely discussed in the American newspapers, and "revivalism" and its machinery and modus operandi are likely, like Spiritualism, to be submitted to scientific investigation.

For example, the Chicago Herald has an article on the mesmeric power of a Mrs. Woodworth—a transatlantic Mrs. General Booth, who is "conducting the great revival at Hartford City, Indiana." "Her subjects," it is said, "are not always paralysed at sight, but frequently go away and find themselves prostrated afterward. The wickedest man in the town entered the meeting the other night for the purpose of breaking it up. As he strode up the aisle cursing in a loud voice, the revivalist fixed her eyes on him, and he lost the power of speech for the rest of the evening. One young woman went to an evening service and returned home in a normal condition. The next morning she was found sitting up in bed, cold and stiff, with wide staring eyes and speechless. It took three hours of hard work to bring her out of her trance."

That is pretty fair, but the case of Miss Viola Mc Dermot is even more interesting. She goes off into trances every time she attends the revival, and in spirit visits the eternal world. "I know as well as anybody," she says, "when the trances are coming. My hands get cold and I can feel my arms stiffening. My eyes get hard and the inside of the church-room gets smaller. The darkness begins at the outer edges of the room and comes toward me from all sides. Finally the sight is gone and I am in two worlds. I can hear everything that is said here, and there I can see the great white throne." There are many other people in that vicinity similarly affected.

Everyone who has read Professor Gregory's work on Mesmerism, or paid any reasonable attention to psychological phenomena can see how perfectly analogous are the operations of Moody and Sankey, the Salvation Army, the Bethshans, and the rude, but effectively pious, mesmerism of our missions and revivals, to the curious and amusing exhibitions of Madame Card and the so-called Electro-Biologists—with this difference—Madame Card selects her subjects, and at the end of her experiments, takes off the spell, and leaves them as sane as usual. The revivalists let the spell remain to wear off gradually. Sometimes it lasts a long time—perhaps a lifetime.

"KARMA," a novel, by Mr. A. P. Sinnett, author of "The Occult World" and "Esoteric Buddhism," has just been published. We understand the story is concerned with incidents of an "occult" character.

Mrs. RICHMOND.—It has been arranged, we are informed, that Mrs. Richmond will resume the series of discourses given by her last year in Kensington Town Hall (opposite Metropolitan and District Station, High-street) on Sunday evenings, the 17th, 24th, 31st May, and the 7th, 14th June, at seven p.m.

We understand that Mr. Hargrave Jennings, author of "The Rosicrucians," "One of the Thirty," "Live Lights and Dead Lights," and other works, has made application for entry to Llanthony Monastery, where he proposes to end his days in solitude, and live according to the rule of St. Benedict. He will be received with due ceremony after Father Ignatius' London mission.

"THERE ARE MORE THINGS IN HEAVEN AND EARTH, HORATIO, THAN ARE DREAMT OF IN YOUR PHILOSOPHY."

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE CONVERSAZIONE OF THE SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE, HELD APRIL 24TH, 1885, IN THE BANQUETING HALL OF ST. JAMES'S HALL, REGENT-STREET, LONDON.

By T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—

By the kind invitation of your Executive, I appear before you as a provincial stranger for the purpose of occupying forty-five minutes of your time, with a view to placing before you, in the concise possible manner, some of my psychological experiences, which come strictly under the classification of facts that are more strange than "are dreamt of" in the philosophy of the majority of mankind.

The phenomena of Modern Spiritualism cover a very large field, extending from table-tipping to the complete materialisation of entire human forms, and from the most childish and commonplace twaddle to the most profound scientific and philosophical disquisitions.

The interpretations of those phenomena widely differ, extending from alleged trick, on the one hand, to the direct and conscious agency of intelligent beings who have passed from this life to another sphere of existence on the other.

The holders of the trick theory are those who for the most part have not fully investigated the phenomena, and who are abnormally prejudiced against the reception of new occult facts; the advocates of ab-ectra spirit agency theory being those who have devoted much time and care to the critical examination of the phenomena.

As a stranger among you, I may state, prior to quoting facts which appear clearly to prove independent spirit agency, that I have carefully investigated these phenomena for upwards of thirty years, that I am not conscious of being in the least degree mediumistic, and that I have examined the manifestations as a cool and unimpulsive outside observer, being quite indifferent as to the conclusions arrived at, so long as those conclusions commended themselves to me as genuine.

I propose this evening to place on one side all merely physical phenomena, the genuineness of which I have ascertained, and to explain some of the more striking psychological facts that have come under my observation.

I may state en passant that the facts which took place at some of the séances to which I am about to refer have been published in consecutive order in the pages of "LIGHT," a valuable journal issued weekly at a very moderate price.

The records of the first and second séances refer to music and acoustics, the third séance to the conditions of the future life, and the fourth and fifth séances embrace replies to hypercritical questions on abstruse musical laws. These questions and answers published in "LIGHT" probably have been, or, at least, may be, read by all who are present. I shall not, therefore, quote them at length, but after describing the mode in which the séances were conducted, and the answers obtained, I shall give several typical questions and answers from the records of the subsequent séances attended by the same lady medium.

The medium was twenty-six years of age. She attended as a child a Wesleyan day-school; her tuition was much interfered with by ill-health; she had a few months' instruction when she was about fifteen years of age. She was the wife of an outdoor foreman over riverside labourers, with the weekly wage of an ordinary workman. She and her husband lived in a small three-roomed house, and she did all the cooking, cleaning, and work of the house herself. She had no taste for scientific studies; never attended a scientific lecture, nor read a scientific book, and was never known to converse on scientific subjects. Her reading consisted, for the most part, of novels, travels, and tales; and her education was, in a word, of a very ordinary kind. Her manners were quiet and refined for her station, and her general conversational power tolerably good, although she spoke little.

Her knowledge of science was, so far as I could ascertain, absolutely blank. She did not receive any remuneration for her mediumistic services, but gave them quite gratuitously, and the only expense incurred was in the preparation of the MS. books, in which the questions and answers were written; these I purchased and now keep.

She was, during the séances, not in a trance, or mesmeric sleep, but was, to all appearance, in her normal condition, and took part in the general conversation as did any one at the table.

The only abnormal sensation she had was that of her hand being invisibly directed, and she had not any consciousness of what was being written. When I read the answers audibly she did not understand the meanings of many of the words, nor did she, or the great majority of those present, understand the drift and meaning of many of the replies.

The arrangements for the séances were of the most simple kind. The number present at each séance varied from six to ten persons. We sat round a plain deal table, the top of which was about four feet by two feet. MS. books and pencils were placed on the table. I generally sat next to the medium and wrote the questions in the MS. books as they were being asked, and turned the book to the medium, who instantly wrote the replies to the questions. As each answer was written I read it aloud, so that all present saw and heard the questions and answers written and read. The hand of the medium unquestionably replied to each question asked, and the problem for solution is, did the medium of her own knowledge write the replies, or, as was persistently alleged, was her hand controlled and guided by some invisible intelligence, or intelligences, who possessed the scientific knowledge that was communicated. The theory of thought-reading is ruled out of court by the fact that the answers to the questions were in many, probably the majority of cases, beyond the knowledge of all those present.

To arrive at satisfactory conclusions in an occult and unique case of this kind, all care should be exercised. It may be affirmed that the medium and I conspired to deceive the other sitters.

My reply to that is, that such a theory is at least morally improbable; second, that several of the questions were unknown to myself, and were asked by others present, so that if the theory of deception is to be introduced they also must have been confederates. I think, therefore, we may conclude that the confederacy theory is untenable, and we are thrown back upon the skill of the medium or on the theory that her hand was controlled by invisible intelligences.

As no woman in England, nor man either, could answer the questions so well under similar conditions, it seems to be not merely improbable, but impossible that she replied to them from her own stores of knowledge, and we are therefore driven to the conclusion that invisible beings through her hand wrote the replies. If any persons anywhere doubt the accuracy of these statements, I shall be glad to test them with the unpublished questions.

I propose now to give typical questions from the séances with the answers received. They cover a very large field of inquiry, embracing music, acoustics, musical instruments, the conditions of the future life, musical composers and their works, heat, light, optics, biology, botany, anatomy, physiology, the brain, the eye, the ear, the circulation of the blood, the nervous system, chemistry, metaphysics, electricity, magnetism, history, clairvoyance, mesmerism, and other subjects.

It is professed that the replies were written by, or at the dictation of, a departed German student, an American student and Federal soldier, a Spanish child, a German lady, an English physician, a doctor of the Alexandrian School, an English gentleman, and others. The writing and composition varied according to the idiosyncrasies of the various writers. I quote verbatim from the questions and replies, and select typical answers from various departments of inquiry.

[Mr. Barkas then proceeded to give selections from the questions and answers somewhat resembling those which have already appeared in "LIGHT" from February 21st to April 25th. The subjects to which the questions referred comprised Light, Heat, Electricity, Magnetism, Galvanism, Pneumatics, Acoustics, Physiology, Anatomy. At other séances the subjects longly discussed were the distribution and functions of the Encephalic Nerves, Electricity, Mediumship, Circulation of the Blood, Man spiritually, Automata, Functions of the Brain, Heat, Natural Philosophy of the Ancients, ditto of the Middle Ages, John Harrison's Criticism of Hume's Essay on Heat, Vegetable Life, Philosophy of Consciousness, the Modus Operandi of Spiritual Phenomena. Conditions of the Future Life, Metaphysics, Atoms, Ozone, and a long and philosophical essay on Chemistry, concluded the series of thirty-eight séances with this medium.]

I have now endeavoured to place before you some of the more salient features of this investigation.

You will agree with me that a large and somewhat abstruse field was covered, and that the majority of the replies could not be given by any woman of ordinary education. There are some replies that might have been given by any one of average intelligence, but, on the other hand, there are many that could not normally have been given except by some one who had had the advantage of a severe scientific training, and the area of inquiry is so extensive that it is very probable the whole of the questions could not have been answered so well under similar conditions by any living man or woman.

You will have observed that I have not given the name of any one who attended the séances; that is not because I do not possess them, for they are recorded in full in the original MS. records of the séances. The prejudices, however, against following investigations of this kind are so great, that I prefer bearing the entire responsibility myself, rather than drag the names of quiet, retiring persons into the public arena.

If, however, any accredited society, say the Royal Society or the Society for Psychical Research, please to appoint a committee for investigation, I shall be glad to give them the names and addresses of all who were present at the séances, and afford them every facility for the fullest and most searching inquiry. The only exception is the name of the professor of music, whose name I would not give without his direct consent.

Permit me to say briefly, in conclusion, that I fail to see that any explanation of these phenomena will cover the entire ground, other than that which is claimed by the alleged producers of them, viz., that the replies were given by persons in the spiritual world, who had for the most part acquired the scientific knowledge displayed in the replies during their residence on earth. That position, I believe, is the only one logically defensible.

ALLAN KARDEC'S ANNIVERSARY.—Many Spiritists met March 29th, convened by the Society founded by him, at the tomb of Allan Kardec, bringing flowers, crowns, &c. Communications were read from all countries, and orations were delivered. They are reported in full in the Revue Spirite. A separate celebration was organised by the Union Spirite for the 31st, reported in Le Spiritisme, and was attended by about 300 members of the thirty societies forming the Union. At this, communications from the provinces were read, and orations were delivered by well-known disciples. Whatever difference, unknown to us, there may be between the Société and the Union, it did not appear on this occasion: all were evidently of one mind in paying the highest respect to the memory of Allan Kardec, and in evincing zeal in the cause with which his name is identified.

THE "GHOSTS" of the past were regarded as emerging in some miraculous way from some awful realm; but the apparitions manifesting themselves in the present day are recognised as coming, in accordance with law, from the contiguous spiritual realm. Spiritualism has banished ghosts, hobgoblins, &c., and has introduced us to the presence of people from the other world, who appear as natural and pleasant to us as we in this world do to each other. The investigations of Spiritualism bring within the range of their studies mesmerism, magnetic healing, clairvoyance, mind-reading, &c., and in their studies they are often undeniably aided by the intelligence of spirits—the people from the other world. Certain sectarists go on charging us with diabolism, and certain scientists with dabbling in a survival of old superstitions. We repudiate both charges, as coming from the platforms of bigotry and ignorance. We hold, on the contrary, that Spiritualism in its higher aspects marks clearly the line between miraculous superstition and the study of natural psychical phenomena and their laws.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THE EDITOR OF Facts quotes from Spirit Voices the report of a séance at Boston, Mrs. Bliss, the medium, at which were invited Spiritualists only. Many materialised spirits were recognised. The most striking manifestations were by 1. Blueflower, a bright talkative young spirit; 2. Lucille Weston, dressed in splendid white, who sang exquisitely; 3. Captain Hedges, tall and handsome, in uniform; 4. A German Doctor, short, slender, energetic, with head high and broad, long beard and whiskers; 5. Harry Montague, a late dramatic artist; 6. Ada Isaacs Menken; 7. The beautiful Helen Western with her little daughter; 8. Billy, a witty young spirit, of great strength; 9. Mrs. McCarty, a simple quaint old lady; 10. The wife of Mr. Smith, the organ manufacturer, who was called to her at the cabinet, and who walked with her arm-in-arm before the circle; and 11. Sister Josephine, who sang "Ave Maria" with exquisite taste and feeling. The editor of Facts says that he has attended many of Mrs. Bliss's séances, has met with some of the spirits here named, and has listened with delight to their singing.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.* VIII.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

We have still to weigh the somewhat vague assertions intended to reconcile the apparent incompleteness of evidence, in such cases where the medium has been discovered appalled in the "flowing garments." It is stated that the invisible spirit first produces the drapery, then dresses the medium, and, this finished, takes possession, of or animates, his body. Some prefer the theory that the medium does the work under control and automatically. If we accept either view, the suspicious-looking incident of mediums being discovered in the act of arraying themselves is explained, for it would seem that in such cases the real actor is the spirit, which, on account of its ethereal nature, is invisible, and causes the blame to fall upon the medium. However, this generally admitted explanation of the somewhat awkward position in which mediums have at times been found, requires for its acceptance more substantial evidence than has as yet been forthcoming. As it stands at present it seems a mere prolegomena intended to exonerate the impostor, and it fails to enlighten the inquirer why the drapery is arranged over the medium's usual attire; for this would imply that the spirit acting as "costumier" is either unable to judge of the awful incongruity of the circumstance, or, premeditatedly conceals it, which, in the latter case, would be equivalent to fraud. Nor can the subterfuge of "evil influences," causing the medium to masquerade before the circle, be expected to find many adherents amongst Spiritualists, since this would simply be a confession of invoking and conniving at intrigues, not on the part of the medium himself, but on that of corrupted denizens from the outer world. It may be perfectly true that but too often low or undeveloped spirits influence the medium; but when they play tricks, cheat, and, out of desire to commit mischief, actually bring discredit upon an otherwise estimable cause, it will be simply doing an act of justice to both medium and investigator to abolish the conditions under which ill-natured spirits can manifest at all. If transformations should take place whilst the medium is visible, or in the circle, hands being joined, they must be welcome, and their value may be judged and appreciated. Unfortunately, under test conditions, they either never occur or have been entirely overlooked. As to such cases of supposed or professed transformations where no perceptible alteration in the medium's features is discoverable, and where the latter appears in "spirit"-costume, there is no alternative but to pronounce it a fraud perpetrated by either the would-be medium or, what is more likely, the "spirit" present. In all cases of transformation, the real value of this kind of phenomena can only be established by experiment and by rigidly excluding the cabinet and all other arrangements which would make deception possible. However, although it is not my wish to hint at discrepancies, I consider it the duty of every Spiritualist to record the results derived from his personal investigations, no matter whether these are in harmony, or in direct contradiction, with previously-accepted doctrines. The "facts" themselves remain, and may serve as material for others to deal with. What is still to be settled is, how far all the "facts" are spiritual.

Now in the case of "spirit"-drapery we are undoubtedly dealing with a real spiritual fact, for its gradual formation and its sudden disappearance can be witnessed. Although it must be earthly in its origin, it is nevertheless liable to changes and modifications which no earthly being could possibly effect; hence it must in some respects possess a characteristic which is neither strictly earthly nor strictly spiritual. The fact that by the superior power of "spirits" it can be made to assume different degrees of solidity would suffice to indicate the strange peculiarity of its substance, because the same spirits could not cause a similar change in ordinary drapery, viz., such of which they do not possess the spiritual counterpart. There are, besides, some features connected with this substance which are so mysterious as to baffle all attempts at further research. For instance, it has been observed that a female spirit appeared in a duplication of the male psychic's wearing apparel, the latter differing only by its more subtle texture. Colonel Olcott mentions a case where the medium wore a black merino dress, and a hole cut from the "spirit's" drapery made a corresponding deficiency in the dress of the former. I have witnessed cases which induce me to believe that the medium's double can be projected and solidified, and that a similar occurrence presented itself in Colonel Olcott's case. But of this later on. Another strange fact may be observed in such cases when a form is seen to dematerialise. It might be supposed that whereas it has been seen to appear by accretion or agglomeration, it would have to disappear by a conversion of the process, i.e., by gradual attenuation. So it does, in cases where its perfect solidity has not been established, and it is not unlikely that in the majority of cases, when the manifestations occur in total darkness, the perfectly solid vanishes also gradually. Yet in those cases where the form dematerialises in full view, the drapery, instead of losing in substantiality, diminishes in quantity. It does not accumulate in a heap, or fall in pleats, but appears to sink away together with the form. I have noticed this, perhaps, as many as fifty times and within two feet distance from my eyes.

MR. GOWLAND, THE "EXPOSER," AT BARROW-IN-FURNESS.

On Thursday evening week Mr. T. W. Gowland, of Ulverston, gave his now pretty generally ridiculed exposition of slate-writing in the Temperance Hall, Barrow-in-Furness. The members of the Barrow Spiritualists' Association mustered in force, and Mr. Speed, of the Ulverston Mirror, Mr. T. S. Sykes, clerk to the Ulverston Board of Guardians, and Mr. James Hamer, manager for the principal mining company in Furness, were also present. The bills described the affair as "Common Sense v. Spiritualism. Eglinton and Slade Exposed," and also invited discussion, but Mr. Gowland, knowing that a vigorous opposition was intended, used every stratagem to prevent there being a chance of reply. He made his appearance about half-an-hour late, although he had been in the town more than an hour before the time for commencing, and then endeavoured to spin out his proceedings so that his opponents, who had to return home by a train leaving at ten o'clock, would not have time to speak. But this attempt was frustrated by their determined efforts, and they then proceeded to show in the most conclusive manner that Mr. Gowland's séance was a mere farcical representation of those held by Mr. Eglinton. Mr. Gowland, in reply, challenged Mr. Eglinton to come back to the district and reproduce his manifestations in his (Mr. Gowland's) presence. Mr. Hamer thereupon, amidst loud applause, challenged Mr. Gowland to produce a single manifestation of Mr. Eglinton's under the same conditions, offering to stake £5 on the result. We may mention that the chairman, Mr. T. Wood, a prominent Secularist, expressed his belief in the existence of certain occult, though not spiritual, forces, not yet cognised by science, and cited, in proof of this assertion, his public experience with Mr. Alexander Scott, the thought-reader, who had informed him the number of a bank note enclosed in a seal'd envelope, though the number was known to none but himself (Mr. Wood). The chairman also admitted that Spiritualism was growing. What the opinion was of Mr. Gowland's "exposure" may be estimated from the following quotation from the report in the Barrow News: "One gentleman said they had certainly seen an exposure, not of Mr. Eglinton's performance, but of Mr. Gowland's ignorance, a sentiment which the audience, from their loud plaudits, evidently concurred with." This appeared, notwithstanding a visit made by Mr. Gowland to the office of this paper the day after his performance, with a view to obtain a more favourable report than he apprehended would be given. He boasts that the reporter having written the sentence, "Several gentlemen gave conclusive evidence in favour of Mr. Eglinton's slate-writing," he (Mr. Gowland) induced the editor to strike out the word "conclusive." We might mention that Mr. Gowland's method of slate-writing, simple and anything but clever though it is, is not even his own idea, but that of a Mr. Haines, a gentleman of some standing in Ulverston, who imparted it to him.

"LIGHT" WANTED.—To complete our binding files we require a few copies of No. 217 (February 28th, 1885). We shall be obliged to any of our readers having copies of this issue to spare if they will forward them to us.

* A few sets of these chromo drawings still remain, and may be obtained of the Manager of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave Maria-lane, E.C., price 2s. 6d. the set, packed on roller for safe transmission by parcel post.—SEE ADVT.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—Notwithstanding the fact that the conversation of the Alliance and a meeting of the S.P.R. had been fixed for the same evening, there was no appreciable falling off in the attendance at the former on Friday, April 24th, when a large audience assembled in St. James's Hall, to hear Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., of Newcastle-on-Tyne. A report of his address will be found in another page, and when he finished speaking the somewhat lively questioning to which he was subjected, showed how keen was the interest taken in his statements. We hope to see Mr. Barkas amongst us again very shortly.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY held its annual meeting on the 27th inst., on which occasion a paper by the president, Dr. Anna Kingsford, was read and discussed. The Society will hold weekly meetings throughout the ensuing session, at the rooms of the Royal Asiatic Society, 22, Albemarle-street, W. Papers have been promised by Major Arthur Lillie, the Hon. Roden Noel, Mr. C. C. Massey, Mr. Edward Maitland, and others. The Society will gladly issue invitations to visitors on application to Mr. Edward Maitland, Oxford and Cambridge Club, Pall Mall, S.W., who will furnish inquirers with particulars as to dates of meeting, and subjects of papers, and terms of Fellowship.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of the Society for Psychical Research was held on the evening of the 24th, at the Rooms of the Society for British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, and was attended by over 300 members and friends. Professor Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., the president of the Society, occupied the chair. In his opening remarks he briefly sketched the rise and progress of the Society. He mentioned the main features of the work in which it had been engaged, and spoke of the amount of evidence placed before its own members, a large portion of which had been published in the Proceedings. He paid a high tribute to the value of the services which the late president, Professor Sidgwick, had rendered to the Society, in a variety of ways. Mrs. Sidgwick read the concluding portion of her paper "On the Evidence, collected by the Society, for Phantasms of the Dead." It is intended to include the paper in full in the forthcoming Part of the Proceedings. At its conclusion, discussion was invited, in which Mr. F. W. H. Myers, Mr. Bidder, Q.C., the president, and others took part. Owing to the lateness of the hour, it was agreed to defer the second paper by Messrs. E. Gurney and F. W. H. Myers, on "Some Higher Aspects of Mesmerism," to the next meeting.

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS (Lamb's School-room, 43, Manor-place, Walworth).—On Sunday evening last Mr. Robson, of Peckham, was present, and his instructors delivered through him an address on "Life in the Summer Land." The address was one of great importance, illustrating as it did the condition and development of a spirit in the higher spheres of existence. After the address a number of questions were asked, to which answers of a conclusive character were given. Mr. Butcher, also of Peckham, was present, and, at the wish of the controls of Mr. Robson, spoke in his normal condition for a few minutes. Mr. Robson once more went under spirit control, and concluded the meeting by giving a short impromptu poem on "Mediumship."—On Sunday next Mr. A. Savage will be the speaker, and we hope all who have not heard him will come and listen to him.—Cor.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, April 26th, the guides of Mr. E. W. Wallis spoke at both forenoon and evening meetings. At the close of the usual address in the forenoon the control changed, and "Lighthouse," after delivering an impromptu rhyme strung upon words promiscuously suggested by the audience, gave a psychometric delineation of an elderly gentleman, a stranger, which turned out to be very true and successful. Besides the salient characteristics of this person being described to the satisfaction of a friend (Dr. Mack) who accompanied him, "Lighthouse" was able to "sense" his condition so as to indicate the influence upon the gentleman's past life of certain occurrences at, or about, certain times, to his satisfaction. It was admitted that such experiences had been undergone and that such had been their effect upon his life. The clairvoyant description of a spirit friend followed, which was also satisfactory to the same person.—The evening's discourse was on "Sacred Scriptures: Their Nature and Use." Its deliverance was marked by exceptional vigour, and the treatment of the subject was full and complete.—On Monday evening, May 4th, at eight o'clock, a meeting will be held in the Hall to make arrangements for the conduct of a mutual improvement branch of the Society, and if possible to arrange a syllabus of subjects for discussion. The usual Tuesday evening séance will not be interfered with.—Sr. Munro.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

S. P. ATKINSON.—Proof shall be sent to you.
COLONEL BUNDY.—Cuttings received. Thanks.
R. KLENCK.—P.O.O. received and dealt with as desired.
OSWALD MURRAY.—We are pleased to make the announcement you wish.

R. D.—Your notice came too late. Will you send us copies of any reports, or have one made for next week's "LIGHT"?

A. H. SYKES.—Too late for this issue. Your communication shall have attention in due course.

J. VEITCH.—"Psychic Facts" will partly supply what you want. It is supplied by the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, W.C. We note that you safely received the parcel of "LIGHT" for free distribution.

G. F. PARSONS.—The reason you did not receive the plates is that you did not conform to the terms of the thrice repeated announcement. They can only be obtained now on payment. See advt.

E. ADAMS.—We had seen Mr. Maskelyne's article. Thanks, however, for the paper. We had hoped from his letter, which recently appeared in these columns, that he had become a little less biased, but these slanders prove we were mistaken. Even had we time to write to your local papers as you suggest, we fear there would be little chance of the letter being inserted. The posters would do good, no doubt, and would be effective. Apply acent these to the secretary of the London Spiritualist Alliance, 16, Craven-street, Strand, W.C.

F. J. THEOBALD.—Your letter has been forwarded. Subjects such as that dealt with in "Symptomata" may not suit all readers of "LIGHT," but you must remember that we have to cater, more or less, for students of every phase of psychological research. Bearing this in mind, we do not think you will find undue prominence given to any particular line of thought; and while we are Spiritualists, and write primarily for such, yet, as we cannot claim the possession of absolute truth, we are pleased to afford a channel for the views of those who differ from ourselves. The comparative study of occult phenomena is much needed, and our correspondent may, we think, learn something from the Society for Psychical Research on the one hand, from the Theosophical Society on the other, or even from Laurence Oliphant's new Syrian "revelation."

A. L.—Probably personal feeling is at the bottom of the matter. With the exception of one book, no work published by the Psychological Press has or could, under the circumstances, have produced a balance on the profit side. Even in the case of the book which forms the exception to the rule the author has given far more away than he has received. Why trouble, however? It is impossible to please everybody, and although such misrepresentations, especially when wilful, may mislead some who do not give thought to the matter, yet the best plan is to leave them severely alone. Please do not write again on this matter. If pursued, it is apt to get personal, and from the first we have steadily refused to allow personalities to creep into "LIGHT." All we do is regulated by public necessity and expediency, and without reference to our private likes and dislikes, of which, being human, we are, unfortunately, not altogether free.

J. J. ROGERS.—With reference to the paragraph about Spiritualism and the Royal Family, and the alleged contradiction by the private secretary of the Queen, the following cutting from the Pall Mall Gazette will, we think, throw a little light on the matter:—

"Mr. J. S. Farmer, the editor of 'LIGHT,' sends us the following communication:—In your issue of Wednesday, the 25th inst., you copied from the Addicted Evening Journal a letter, purporting to have been written by Sir Henry Ponsonby, her Majesty's private secretary, asserting that 'it is not true that the members of the Royal Family are believers in Mr. Eglinton's Spiritualism;' and also a letter from the Hon. Alexander Yorke, who was enquired to the late Duke of Albany, stating that the notorious Bramah-lock double slate used by Mr. Eglinton was not given to him by his Royal Highness. As to both these letters, knowing what I do, I can only describe them as exceedingly diplomatic. Will Sir Henry Ponsonby, leaving out the qualification of 'Mr. Eglinton's Spiritualism'—whatever that may be—plainly assert that none of the members of the Royal Family have ever attended spiritualistic séances, or that they have not arrived at a belief in the possibility of communication with the unseen world? And will the Hon. Alexander Yorke kindly inform your readers who it really was who presented the Bramah-lock slate to Mr. Eglinton? I happen to be aware that he (Mr. Yorke) knows, and it would be interesting if he would be ingenious enough to state the fact. He could do so without any breach of confidence."

These questions have never been answered, although care was taken to send copies of the paper to those concerned. Further, we learn from the last Harbinger of Light, that the original statement which drew forth Sir Henry Ponsonby's statement, says nothing about Mr. Eglinton's Spiritualism, in fact does not mention his name, so that the denial, if genuine, looks very like an evasion of the question. Our readers must draw their own conclusions.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

IS IT CONJURING?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See Psychische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBI, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.'"

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances, I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. PSYCHOMETRY.

By "M. A. (Oxon)."

Among the subjects which invite notice from Spiritualists Psychometry has received much less attention than it deserves, far less than it has had in America. Professor Denton's "Soul of Things," a book in which he recorded a remarkable series of experiments with his wife, drew marked attention to the broad subject of Psychometry. Mrs. Denton's powers, it is true, were remarkable in a high degree. The mere contact with some material object, a fragment chipped from the Great Pyramid or from the temples of Thebes or Karnae, an Indian relic, a piece of cloth, seemed to place her en rapport with the scenes and surroundings from which these isolated fragments had been separated. She lived again through the events which had occurred around them, and the records of her revelations were, in cases that were verifiable, very often singularly exact.

So far as I know, Mrs. Denton's powers as a Psychometrist were unique, and I believe I am right in saying that she always regarded them as purely natural, and that the results obtained through them did not induce her to join the ranks of Spiritualists, or to abandon what I believe was always her standpoint of Materialism. The words are loosely used, and I shrink from their rough-and-ready application. It is so easy to use them as mere nicknames, that one desires to avoid anything but an exact application of the terms, and certainly not to use either of them in such a connection as necessarily implying either praise or censure. But I believe I do Mrs. Denton no wrong by saying that her psychometric powers did not interfere with her materialistic beliefs. She regarded what she did as the exercise of gifts that were natural, though perhaps highly developed.

We have no such gifted Psychometrist at hand in England. But there is another phase of what is a large and very important inquiry, which I should like to see carefully investigated; I allude to the delineation of character from handwriting. I do not mean clairvoyant perception; this is a gift by itself. The clairvoyant, being in an abnormal condition, and sometimes deeply entranced, will place a letter on the forehead or top of the head, and so read its contents, or perhaps become en rapport with its writer and describe his surroundings. This abnormal faculty may be developed to an extent which to the inexperienced investigator would seem incredible. No doubt among the vast number of communications sent to the Society for Psychical Research there are many bearing upon clairvoyance.

The special gift, however, to which I desire to direct attention is of a different kind, or, at least, is exercised under different conditions, and without any abnormal state of the Psychometrist. A scrap of writing, not necessarily conveying any sense to the reader, is sent by post to the delineator of character. It may be written in a language with which he is familiar; or it may be in strange characters, Hebrew, Greek, or the like. It is not necessary, apparently, that any idea should be conveyed by the writing to the mind of the Psychometrist. The method used probably varies with various delineators, but in one case that I have taken pains to look into—that of a lady who does not authorise me to publish her name, though I am enabled to give an address which will find her—the method is very simple. She places her hand upon the paper and endeavours to concentrate her mind upon the writer's characteristics; that is, she assumes a state of passivity which soon becomes one of abstraction. The mental concentration is, I take it, the precursor of a condition of passive abstraction which experience shows to be so favourable a state for the production of the phenomena familiar to the Spiritualist. She gets her results preferably alone and in isolation; just as the automatic writing, I can vouch, is most readily obtained under similar circumstances. The shape of the letters, the style of the handwriting, the matter contained in the extract or letter, have little or nothing to do with the result. I believe, though I am not able to assert this, that a piece of plain paper, which was suitably imbued with the "atmosphere" of the person whose character was to be delineated, would answer equally well. Certain it is that scraps of writing, in an unknown language, have formed the material from which character has been successfully delineated by this lady.

I have seen some score or more of these character-delineations. I tested the power myself, in the first instance, by sending three scraps clipped from letters in my possession. One was that of an eminent man, filling a prominent public position, who is quite unacquainted with this subject. Another was that of a man of marked individuality, a Spiritualist, but quite unknown to the medium personally, or by handwriting. The third was that of a lady, herself highly gifted with psychical powers. Three persons, more entirely dissimilar—a Materialist, pure and simple, a Spiritualist of ripe experience, a medium of the highest development—could scarcely be conceived. The handwritings were totally dissimilar, and of well-defined individuality. The delineations were equally distinct, and singularly happy. Of course I gave no name: the scraps of writing were merely numbered one, two, and three. Yet, what was said of No. 1 was in no way applicable to No. 2, or to No. 3, and the prominent characteristics of each person were decidedly hit off. If I might have been permitted to cut out the generalities (which I can easily understand it is difficult to avoid in the perpetual delineation of character) and put down only the sharply-defined phrases indicative of each character, I could have easily picked out half a dozen such specific statements in each, which were at once strikingly true of the writer, and quite inapplicable to the authors of the other writings sent by me.

I was interested enough to recommend some friends to make trial of this lady's powers, and I have seen many of the results. They are usually successful in hitting off a few salient points in the character; and sometimes they are curiously exact and true, when allowance has been made for the generalities which most of the delineations contain. I think the lady of whom I am writing offers material for interesting investigation. Obvious reasons prevent me from publishing her name, but I am permitted to say that letters will reach her, and receive attention if addressed, with enclosure of a half-crown fee, to

Miss C. R.,
41, High-street, Smethwick,
Birmingham.

There must be others who possess, or who could develop similar powers. My only object in mentioning this particular lady is to draw attention to a phase of investigation that affords matter of interest, and I name her because I have had personal experience of her powers.

SPIRITUALISM FORTY YEARS AGO.

Among odd volumes that I have chanced upon in the desultory reading which alone suits a sick chamber, is one by Horace Smith (of "Rejected Addresses" fame), called "Mesmerism: a Mystery." The book bears date 1845, and deals in a rather high-flown and rhapsodical fashion with the phenomena of mesmerism, clairvoyance, and the spiritual experience of a seer. A highly sensitive girl having undergone mesmeric treatment at the hands of a London physician, Dr. Peterson, develops evidences of clairvoyance, and foretells the death of her twin sisters, and is warned of her own departure by an apparition of one who announced himself as "The Universal Friend," whose touch was icy cold, but whose voice, "so much more musical than music," promised her relief from all human suffering and woe. Death, under this guise of the great benefactor, whose voice so near and sweet, yet sounding from so far a distance, composed all differences and smoothed away all pains, claims her according to his promise, and we have a rather stagey death-scene, together with many curious speculations as to the whence and whither of the human spirit, and its power of communion with the unseen world. The novel is rife with what we now call Spiritualism, and is noteworthy on account of its author and the early date at which it was published. Here is a specimen of the speculations which fill the pages. "If there be truth in the nebular theory," she said, as her eye fell upon an astronomical work she had lately been perusing, "if these dimly-seen, luminous clouds wandering through space are but so many gaseous embryos waiting to be condensed into worlds, is it not possible that the beings destined to inhabit those worlds may have a shadowy and analogous pre-existence? The flitting gleams and perfumes, the beauties and the music of nature, and the lightning thoughts that flash across the brain, coming we know not whence and going we know not whither, may not these be the wandering elements of souls waiting to be embodied? May these not be apparitions of the unborn—antenatal as well as posthumous phantoms—unembodied as well as disembodied spirits?" Forty years ago, it would seem, people who had lifted a corner of the veil perplexed themselves with much the same questionings that vex us now.

A book depôt in connection with the "Dissemination Scheme" has now been opened at 16, Craven-street, Strand, where the literature of Spiritualism and cognate subjects may be obtained.

UNDER the title of "Historic and other Doubts, or the Non-existence of Napoleon Proved," Mr. E. W. Allen has issued a translation of M. J. B. Pères' celebrated jeu d'esprit. This reprint is enriched by an introduction by Dr. Garnett, the assistant keeper of printed books in the British Museum.

MEDIUMSHIP, ORTHODOXY, AND LAW.

(From the Revue Spirite.)

History informs us how orthodoxy has ever been ready to repress new ideas and knowledge. How blindly and stolidly it, for example, denounced magnetism. This spirit of orthodoxy is still strong, not only in the churches, no matter of what denomination, but in our academies and halls of science. Magnetism, or mesmerism, has been especially obnoxious to both clericals and savants, indicating and invading, as it does, spirituality. But as magnetism begins now, after a century of orthodox obloquy and persecution, to be generally acknowledged, mediumship and Spiritualism come next to pass through the same ordeal.

Here in France the editor of the Revue Spirite, for taking part in, and publishing an account of the fact of, the photographing of spirit-forms, was, through the twisting of a law, condemned to imprisonment; and even this did not content some, for the wife of a President of the French Republic would have had him burnt as a heretic!

Orthodoxy is the same everywhere, even in the United States, if we may judge from reports in the journals that come to us. From some of these, just to hand, we select for extract the following:—

"One might think that America had by this time emerged from the barbarism of the dark ages. But it has not. In the State of Ontario a citizen has been had up before a judge for witchcraft! It appears that William Merritt, known as a 'medium,' whose peculiar faculty interests a great many, foretold some time ago that a freight train would run off the track of the Canada Southern railroad, and his prediction was verified. A little later he predicted a similar accident to a passenger train, which was also accurately verified both as to time and locality. And so he acquired a reputation, upon the strength of which he was credited with a knowledge, which he did not claim, of other railroad casualties, and it became common for the employés on the line to consult him before their journeys, and if not satisfied with his prognostication, they would make pretexts to evade their duty; then substitutes had to be found, and the service was of course embarrassed.

"The managers asked whether Merritt might not, with confederates, have contrived the accidents. Their surveys reported them to have resulted from strictly assignable and preventable causes. They then got the notion into their heads that as Merritt knew that the accidents would take place, he must, by some unlawful means, have been at the bottom of them somehow; and as he was a 'medium,' what means could they be but those of witchcraft! On this charge, therefore, they had him up before a judge, who promptly looked up the old laws relating thereto, and found one dating from the time of one of the Georges, declared its applicability to the case, and sentenced William Merritt, the medium, to three months' imprisonment if he did not at once clear out of the district."

This is, in reality, because William Merritt happens to be endowed with one of those rare faculties now being studied by Societies for Psychical Research, the idea of whose existence has not yet penetrated orthodox heads. But still we progress; for the time has been when such a charge as this against an American citizen would have been followed, not by imprisoning or banishing, but by lynching or burning.

THE Figaro of Paris says that the dramatist, Victorien Sardou, cannot of himself make the least sketch, but that, under spiritual influence, he has executed masterpieces. Upon a copper plate he etched a most complicated design, under which "The House of Mozart" was inscribed. The work is a piece of delicate and finished art which could not have been executed in less than a month by a professed engraver.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

IX.

By J. G. KEULEMAN.

From these facts, it would appear that the substance can, in some incomprehensible manner, and by various processes, be made to assume the solid, and, conversely, the fluid condition. Instantaneous reproduction of "spirit" drapery has been observed in cases when a "form," after dematerialising, by what we will call the "sinking process," reappears, by ascension, on the very spot whence, some moments before, it had vanished. In this by no means rare phenomenon, "form" and drapery are seen to return in exactly the same conditions, the garments arranged just as when first noticed. As there is no visible depository from whence the material may have been retaken, and as it is certain that there is no resurrection from out of the floor, the only acceptable theory to account for the mystery would be that the substance, or rather the "power," which served as a vehicle to obtain the solidification, and which had been derived from or through the medium, is, instead of being cast off or returned, kept in suspension, i.e., is temporarily stored in the interspace between the medium and the invisible "spirit." I arrive at that conclusion in consequence of having, on two occasions, observed a cloudy, slightly-luminous stream flowing, in a downward curvature, from the "spirit" towards the medium. I was so seated as to have the slowly decreasing "form" a little in front and on my left, with the medium on my right-hand side. After the "form" had gone, this cloudy stream remained visible—as a mass of smoke gently undulating over the carpet—for at least four seconds. On the "form" reappearing, it could not further be noticed on account of the strong light of the luminous slate which the "spirit" used for the exhibition of the phenomenon. I will give a more detailed account of these occurrences in the description of pl. IV.

As regards the convertibility of the substance, or the possibility of the alteration of texture or shape of "spirit" drapery, my personal experience is scarcely sufficient either to support speculations accounting for the facts, or to corroborate the evidence of other investigators. The wonderful manifestations of "spirits" repairing holes cut out of their garments by simple manipulation, and of which many instances have been recorded, are none the less exceptions, observed, as yet, by but a comparative few. On the other hand, I have seen a materialised "form" drop some drapery (about a square foot) from his arm over a large luminous slate, and increase the quantity by merely holding it inside and moving it slowly with the hand. Each time it was taken up, and shaken out again, the quantity had increased considerably, and soon there was drapery enough on the luminous slate and the table, to clothe a small "spirit-form"; there being then at least eight square feet of a very thin, frothy substance, which, when placed over the slate and carried over our heads, resembled a "spirit" floating through space. I believe this process, of increasing the substance from an already solidified sheet of drapery, is resorted to in such cases when two "forms" appear together. As far as my observation goes, the two "forms" differ nearly always in size, and invariably the drapery covering the smaller of the two is much more ethereal than that of the other.

But the simultaneous apparition of two "forms" is also a rare occurrence which, besides, requires further observation and especially careful examination of the respective ap-partitions. If, after repeated observation of this phenomenon, the drapery is found invariably to differ in a similar degree, we may, in default of direct experiment, assume the production of the thinner out of the thicker, or first-formed, quantity. Still, from what I have personally witnessed on many occasions, and with different mediums, I am inclined to the belief that a subsequent abstraction of drapery already formed, occurs more often than circumstances enable us readily to observe. I have often noticed that the drapery of certain "forms," and sometimes also loose pieces carelessly slung over the arms or shoulders, were, on a re-exhibition some seconds afterwards, found to have been altered from a coarse into a fine texture, the arrangement and the shape of the loose pieces remaining the same as on the first appearance.

Personal observation induces me also to surmise that sometimes a "spirit" will lend his drapery to others in order to facilitate their exhibition. I arrived at that conclusion in the following way. A materialised "form," the "leader" of a band, appeared in drapery of thick texture, and, subsequently, five more "forms" (whether all materialisations or transformations I cannot tell, but they all differed individually) followed, each in thick drapery, to all appearance of the very same substance, or, at least, of similar woof. Two days later, the first "form"—the same individual who was first at the previous séance—exhibited himself in thin drapery, and three more "forms" followed in a similar-looking garment. "Spirits" acknowledge the fact and further state they always assist the "apprentices" when they can, either by supplying them with the material or the power. At times, they say, less honest beginners often try to appropriate these necessities without even so much as asking leave.

I must now refer to another circumstance in which drapery plays a certain part, and which involves a not altogether unimportant question, still unanswered because it has, perhaps, never been raised. It was only recently, while pondering over this perplexing drapery problem, that I hit accidentally upon the subject. It is this: What becomes of the "natural" spiritual garments of spirits who habitually manifest at séance-rooms? This would involve a second question, viz., What becomes of the same garments that were once the property of the lower order of spirits haunting houses, infesting and obsessing human beings? Now, here we are, for information, entirely at the mercy of the manifesting "spirits," since direct experiment is, especially with regard to the latter class, hardly possible or advisable. The spiritual garments, I am told, are usually diffused,—not destroyed, but returned to the elements. Sometimes they are preserved and made use of during subsequent materialisations, in which case they appear as in earth-life. At other times they are likewise preserved and amalgamated with the séance-room garments. Occasionally there are none; nor was there, in other cases, a direct necessity for any, because a particular kind of humanity, when passing away, actually "passes away," not into nothingness, but into something very analogous to it, viz., a long continued state of lethargy, i.e., of spiritual coma. In such cases, said my spirit informant, the spiritual garments wear out and gradually vanish because the spirit-life principle required to maintain it is inert.

As regards the obsessing spirits' natural garb, no information could be given, but I was advised to "wait until I met a 'regular' one, and try and get the required evidence first-hand." However, pending this suggested mode of ascertainment, my spiritual teacher volunteered to furnish me with his personal opinion of the case and surmised "diffusion" on the ground that obsessing spirits, being tenants on long lease, are in no absolute want of any garb, the less so since they consider their victim's property, like his body, as belonging to and being actually their own self.

Although the teachings of séance-room "spirits" cannot always be implicitly relied upon, since they are but too often in direct conflict with other statements, by the same or by other "spirits," there is still a certain amount of reasonableness in some of them. Besides, I have frequently noticed that their assertions are in perfect harmony with results obtained independently, and of which also the medium was ignorant. For this reason I think it only fair to hear their explanations and accept their information concerning matters which lie outside our domain of inquiry, and which may be within their experience.

Although, in matters of higher significance, or of a more intricate scientific nature, the information given by habitual séance-room "spirits" should never be accepted without caution, there are yet some very important subjects in reference to their personal experience upon which they may be safely interrogated. If, as often happens, their statements are, to all appearance, inexact, exaggerated, or somewhat incomprehensible on account of the startling novelty of the communication, we should not, therefore, conclude that their information is always untrustworthy and that they have no truth to tell at all. Besides, the value of these statements can only be estimated by those who, from acquired knowledge of the occult sciences and of these phenomena, have been duly prepared to interchange ideas with these beings from the outer world. Spiritualists who have likewise studied mesmerism and its various branches, who are acquainted with the astounding discoveries obtained by psychometry and many other equally surprising realities in psychology, must be aware of the fact that, not unfrequently, assertions made by "spirits" have preceded the actual discovery of many an important truth, and that often a direct scientific experiment has demonstrated the correctness of a previously-received "spirit" communication. The information as to the existence of a spiritual counterpart has, in the same manner, been confirmed by "spirit" photographs and thousands of veridical phantoms that have from time to time been witnessed and recorded. As to the "contact" necessary for the production of that counterpart, its efficiency has been demonstrated by psychometric experiments.

Further, the superhuman powers peculiar to, and by which these "spirits" are enabled to utilise and transform the spiritual counterpart—in short, their power over substance of, no matter what degree of, solidity, is a fact which every human being, gifted with ordinary senses, may witness for himself. If, to support my speculations, I have at times deemed it advisable to consult the "spirits" themselves, I did so, knowing from long-continued investigation what their powers are, and what their experience is likely to be. Asking their opinions on subjects which they must know is no more inexpedient than consulting, in matters of everyday occurrence, the doctor, lawyer, and even the policeman. I do not presume to have settled the problem of "spirit" drapery for once and for ever. Further discoveries, new revelations, or other still unknown phenomena may present themselves that may entirely upset, or cast a totally different light upon, hitherto accepted facts, when other conclusions must be arrived at. But if I have not attained my object of explaining what I consider to be facts, and, if my argument rests upon false premisses, I hope I have, at least, drawn the attention of co-investigators to a highly important subject urgently demanding an explanation.

Mr. J. G. MEUGENS has left England for a visit to the States. He is expected back in London in the early summer.

Mrs. RICHMOND.—It has been arranged, we are informed, that Mrs. Richmond will resume the series of discourses given by her last year in Kensington Town Hall (opposite Metropolitan and District Station, High-street) on Sunday evenings, the 17th, 24th, 31st May, and the 7th, 14th June, at seven p.m.

MATERIALISM RATIONALLY VIEWED.

(Extract from the Spiritual Offering.)

Materialists assume that there is nothing in the universe but matter; that there is no intelligence outside of material organisations; that there is no intelligence in inorganic forms. They present to us an unconscious unintelligent substance, having forces enabling it to detach itself into masses, round these masses into worlds, and evolve from itself forces of cohesion, attraction, gravitation, &c.; and laws, under which it governs itself in ceaseless activities through countless ages! Such powers transcend those attributed by any devotees to any deities. No wonder that students should ask "Whence is this wondrous matter with its manifold powers and tendencies?" An atom of matter has never been seen by man, nor has he been able to produce an instrument for revealing one to his senses. Herbert Spencer says, "Matter is known to us only through the manifestation of force." Then what is force? Dr. Atfield says, "Chemical force, like every other force, is only known by its effects." Professor Robert Hunt says, "We have scarcely arrived at any satisfactory knowledge of the powers which regulate the internal condition of matter." Then matter is asserted to be "known only by its resistance." What becomes of it, then, when resistance is abstracted? Spencer says, "Matter in its ultimate nature is absolutely incomprehensible."

So easily are its Protean forms lost sight of while what are termed its properties are under investigation, that it is a question with many thinkers whether there is any such thing as matter at all. But, admitting the correctness of the atomic theory, how, and from what source do atoms derive their properties—their tendencies? Their moving, as they do, with aim and precision, disproves the materialist's assertion that there is no intelligence in inorganic matter. If atoms manifest tendencies, they either possess intelligence or are mediums through which intelligence flows. In either case it is evident that the universe was not formed, and is not governed, without Intelligence—Spirit—God.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Limitation of the Power of Spirits.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondent, "A.G.W.," slightly misinterprets my statements with respect to "John King's" journey to Australia, and, I presume, must either have forgotten, or misunderstood, what was said on the occasion.

If I recollect aright, the facts alluded to are as follows:—About two years ago Mr. S. Defries, from Sydney, being then in London, attended a séance with Mr. Husk on a Wednesday evening. During the evening, and quite unexpectedly, the music of a certain song or hymn, known to Mr. Defries, but unknown to any one present, was played upon the piano. Mr. Defries at once recognised it as one of the principal hymns sung at the séances held at Sydney, and of which he was (or used to be) a member. As the music was composed by an amateur and Australian gentleman, its reproduction at a séance held in London somewhat startled us, and, needless to add, caused a certain amount of surprise to Mr. Defries. This gentleman, anxious to know the meaning of it, requested one of Mr. Husk's familiars to supply him with some further particulars. All the while the music on the piano was kept up with unabated vigour. This, to all present, seemed as though the invisible musician insisted on being heard and recognised. Mr. Defries was now informed that one of his intimate friends and a member of a circle of Spiritualists in Sydney had, since Mr. Defries' sojourn in England, passed away, and was then present. Later in the evening, some further evidence was given by the Australian spirit speaking in the Scottish dialect and mentioning subjects only known to Mr. Defries himself, leaving no doubt in his mind that his friend, a Scotchman by birth, was actually with him.

Before the close of the séance, Mr. Defries asked "John King" whether it would be possible for him to go to the house in Sydney where the circle assembled and obtain the direct confirmation of his friend's decease. "John's" reply was that it might be done because there happened to be a medium there, but that it depended entirely upon the conditions offered him by this medium at the other end; that at all events, he would try and get there himself, further adding that he had been there lately and on many previous occasions. "John" also mentioned the names of several persons he had met there.

The next day a séance, again with Mr. Husk, was held; this time at the rooms of the late C. A. S., Mr. Defries being also present. Of course the conversation turned upon the remarkable occurrence of the previous day, and all were in great expectancy as to the results of "John's" supposed errand. On the latter's arrival, we were told that he had successfully accomplished the feat; that the usual circle had been present, with the exception of Mr. Defries' friend and also his friend's daughter, who had likewise gone over to the spirit world. A letter, subsequently received by Mr. Defries, contained the news of the decease of both.

Now as to "John King's" journey to the Antipodes. To all appearance he had been there, unless he obtained the information in some other, to us, equally inexplicable manner. Certainly the execution on the piano of a particular hymn, and the additional reference to some particular circumstance in the direct voice, proved that a strange visitor acquainted with the particulars, but now gone over to the other world, had come to us with certain intentions. If "John" received any further information at all, it must have been from that spirit, and the feat would virtually remain the same. But "A.G.W." seems to overlook the fact that in the present case there was (1) a medium at the other end; (2) that outside this material world, time or distance do not exist; (3) that the conditions under which "John's" errand could have been performed, and those under which Gordon was placed in Khartoum were totally different.

Would it have surprised your correspondent if he had been told that an "apparition" of Gordon had been witnessed, at the moment of his death, or that an impression of his dangers had been transmitted, telepathically, by Gordon, and that by such means the fate of the lamented General might have been known to certain persons with whom he happened to be in sympathetic communion? Similar occurrences are sufficiently numerous, and may be said to be established facts. Now, if by supersensuous perception, which is a spiritual faculty, certain events happening at a distance can be communicated by one person to another, why reject the evidence in favour of a similar intercourse between disembodied and embodied spirit? And there can hardly remain any doubt that the familiar "John King" is a spiritual entity. Anyhow, in Mr. Defries' remarkable case it was equally certain that no knowledge of his friend's decease had been received otherwise than by spirit communications.

Besides, the transmission of intelligence between one circle and another, even the transportation of the so-called "power" to and from a distant séance room, by spirits, is (at least, it is believed to rest upon experiment) an established fact. To prove their actual voyage through space or through the earth, otherwise than by the evidence or results obtained, is impossible, since no one ever saw or followed the actual flight of a spiritual being.

The remaining portion of your correspondent's letter, I must leave to others with more time than myself at their disposal to answer. In fact the very reply to any neophyte's objections has been given over and over again in the columns of your valuable paper. "A.G.W." may with advantage read the calm and able communication of "M.E." (pp. 208-9 of the last number). I can only advise him to follow "M.E.'s" example, investigate, and have patience.—I am yours, &c.,

J. G. KEULEMAN.

Emma Hardinge Britten to Her Friends in England.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you favour me by inserting in your paper the following announcement, namely, that we propose to sail for England per "Britannic" on the 2nd of May, and expect to arrive some time about the middle of the month?

To the Spiritualist Societies within an accessible distance of my home in Manchester, I shall be happy to render service as a lecturer, on the same terms as when I was in England before. Applications can be addressed to me at The Limes, Humphrey-street, Chatham Hill, Manchester, and I will reply as soon after my arrival as possible.

I beg to add that my return to England has been induced purely by private and domestic reasons, and my stay will be determined only by the same causes; hence, I may not have the opportunity of remaining for any extended period of time with my esteemed English fellow workers in Spiritualism, and consequently, I am desirous of doing the utmost I can, whilst able, to promote the progress of the cause to which I am devoted.—I am, sir, very faithfully yours,

EMMA H. BRITTEN.

"Twixt two Worlds."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will kindly allow me space to remind intending subscribers to the above work that it is imperative they should forward their names to me on or before the 30th inst. Owing to the unique character of the work, it cannot be issued unless the 500 copies are ordered in advance, and should that number not be subscribed at the time stated, I am instructed to say the work will be abandoned, and cheques returned on the 1st of June. It was not intended from the first to make the book a source of profit, and it was felt that the many friends of Mr. Eglinton would have taken the whole of the edition, which I am happy to say they have done, with the exception of a limited number.

It should be understood that no more than 500 copies of the book will be printed, therefore intending subscribers should remit to me without delay.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

6, Nottingham-place, W.

CHARLES MANNING.

CARDIFF.—We have just received a farewell visit from our much esteemed friend Mr. J. J. Morse. On Sunday and Monday, 26th and 27th April, he delivered three orations at the Town Hall on the following subjects and in the order given:—"Religion: Its Bases and Outcome;" "Saints and Sinners; or, who are the Good?" and "Spiritualism: Its Achievements." The meetings were exceedingly well attended. On Tuesday evening, at a select meeting of Spiritualists, we were privileged to listen to the lofty and philosophical Tien, and the "Strolling Player," who so fashions his wit as to make it subserve the most exalted teachings. On Thursday evening, a soirée was held at the Castle-street Assembly Rooms, at which Mr. Morse presided most ably, in his usual happy style. An extended programme, consisting of instrumental selections by Miss S. C. Cooper, Mr. C. Cooper, and M. Allard; readings by Messrs. J. J. Morse and W. Pryn timer; and songs by Miss Evans, and Messrs. Cooper and E. Adams, was gone through in a very creditable manner. The catering for refreshments was presided over by Mesdames Cooper, Brooks, Lenderyon, Young, and Smallridge, by whom also the room was very prettily decorated. The rooms were kindly lent by Mr. Richard Brooks on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, free of charge. An interesting feature of the evening was a sale, by auction, by Mr. Richard Brooks, of various articles given by members and friends of the society, for the purpose of providing Mr. Morse with some mark of their esteem and of their regret at his departure from amongst us. A beautiful album was also subscribed for by members of the society, in which a suitable inscription was tastefully written, and this, together with a purse containing the proceeds of the sale by auction, was presented to Mr. Morse in the course of the evening. High expressions of regard and appreciation were made by Messrs. Rees, Lewis, and R. Brooks; and Mr. E. Adams, on making the presentation, said: "It is matter for sincere and heartfelt regret that Mr. Morse's state of health and the depletion of vital energy from which he has suffered, caused largely by lack of support and the strong popular prejudice against the cause which it has fallen to his lot to espouse, have conspired to render his departure for a time to 'fresh fields and pastures new,' desirable. We cannot but be deeply impressed by the forcible and eloquent manner in which the claims of Spiritualism upon the serious attention of the public have been, through his instrumentality, from time to time, set forth, and we therefore feel deeply that with Mr. Morse's departure from these shores a powerful advocate, a tower of strength, and a trusty friend is going from our midst. It is, however, some consolation that his labours will still be expended in the same cause, and that other hearts in other parts of the world will thrill and vibrate to the words of wisdom and exalted spiritual teachings so ably and impressively conveyed through his instrumentality."

Mr. Morse replied in a suitable manner, and the proceedings terminated by dancing, which was sustained until about one o'clock a.m.

FACSIMILES OF DIRECT SPIRIT WRITINGS PRODUCED WITHOUT KNOWN HUMAN INTERVENTION.

I advisedly say "without known human intervention" because very frequently, if not always, when direct spirit writings are done in the house, whether in the room where I am or not, I feel indescribable sensations either of confused headache or drawing pains in the lower part of the back, which cease as soon as the Psychogram is completed. The two specimens here given have been re-produced with much care by the aid of photography and the electric light. I would have given many other and distinctly different styles of writing but for the fact that one of my best has been already spoilt in the process! Some day, I may try again for another purpose.

A.—This is a facsimile of direct spirit writing in pencil to which I referred in Light on the 23rd August, 1884. It was written upon the blank fly leaf of a printed circular, of which I had several copies in my study at the time, to use for waste or rough copy. At the back of the printed circular was also another direct spirit writing signed by E. M., who very frequently thus communicates with us. The writings referred to were handed out of the cabinet, in which the medium was sitting in deep trance, by a spirit hand, with five other writings at the same time. These others were of family interest and referred to passing events, with advice thereon. By a reference to Light, 1884, p. 343, it will be seen that Jules Theobald, the spirit signing this writing "A," also signed his name upon the woodwork of the cabinet on the same evening with ten other spirits. This writing on the wood was done during our séance, and we distinctly heard it being done.

At the same séance we were told that the writing (A) was a copy of the Lord's Prayer as used in the 12th century! With this clue I visited the British Museum, and, after four days' search, was shown a copy of Camden's "Britannia," published in 1657, wherein a similar copy of the Prayer is found with this introduction:—"In the time of King Henry the Second, I finde this rime sent from Rome by Pope Adrian, an Englishman, to be taught to the people." Since finding this it has been published in Scraps, together with six other specimens of the Lord's Prayer at various dates; but the one recorded by Camden is as follows:—

Ure fadyr in heaven rich
Thy name be halyed ever lich:
Thou bring us thy michell bliss
Als hit in heaven y - doe,
Eear in yearth beene it also:
That holy bread that hsteth ay,
Thou send it ous this ilke day.
Forgive ous all that we have don,
As we forgivet uch other mon:
Ne let ous fall into no founding,
Ac shield ous fro the fowle thing.

Amen.

I apprehend the spirit wrote from memory, hence the dozen differences indicated by italics between the production A and that recorded by Camden in 1657.

The phenomenon to be accounted for by the non-spiritualist is the appearance of a writing with which no one present was acquainted upon recognised paper in the house; a house, moreover, in which no copy existed.

B.—This is a facsimile of one of my spirit-daughter's letters (of which we have had a large number—frequently a dozen during the week—relating mostly to family matters transpiring at the time). This is by no means one of the smallest specimens of her writing; for I have failed to get one of them transferred to an electro plate. This is chosen because it is clear to read and was written at Haslemere in relation to events passing at the time, upon marked paper we had with us there. The medium was also with us, but I need scarcely add that for such writing to be done by her would be an impossibility; and it would be very difficult for any one else to preserve this character of writing through a hundred specimens written within three months, and to attend to daily avocations at the same time. The message B is as follows:—

MY DEAREST PA AND MAMMA,

I know you are waiting and wanting to hear from me, but you know even when I do not write yet still I am with you and can help you just the same.

Dear ones, I know how hard it is for you to bear the unkindness of the world, the sneers and jests at your expense, but you know if you would do as your Father in heaven wants of you, you must also take up your cross and fight the good fight of faith, and bear your cross manfully and bravely. And again we say unto you, be not discouraged at small failures, as others before you have had worse ones to bear. You will not make the world believe at once in us and in our powers. That will have to be left for time to do, as only time and faith, with prayer and trust in Christ your Saviour will do that; so, dear ones, go on in your good work, and things that seem in darkness now shall be made plain as daylight to you all.

Your loving spirit child, LOUISA.

DESMOND G. FITZ-GERALD.
WILLIAM PAICE, M.A.
E. DAWSON ROGERS.

THIS Alliance has been formed for the purpose of uniting professed Spiritualists and inquirers who are not represented by any existing society: for providing them with opportunities of social intercourse: and for offering them from time to time information respecting the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism by means of papers and discussions. It is also intended to circulate, or rather to aid in circulating, the literature of the subject, and especially the journal of the ALLIANCE—"Light"—in districts where such help is needed.

At present it is deemed wise to confine the efforts of the Society to social and discussion meetings. Rooms have been taken at 16, Craven Street, Strand, where Spiritualists and their friends can read the special journals and newspapers of the movement, and use the library of works on Psychical and Occult Science. This reading-room they hope to make a central meeting-place for Spiritualists visiting London, as well as a centre of work for the benefit of the cause, and they invite gifts of books and periodicals from their friends.

The subscription of members is fixed at a uniform rate of one guinea per annum. No appeals for money will be made beyond this amount, but the Council will gladly take charge of, and administer, any donations entrusted to them for the purpose of aiding poor districts with grants of literature, or copies of "Light." Indeed the usefulness of the ALLIANCE in this and other directions will largely depend on the amount of money, outside of that accruing from subscriptions, which may be placed in the hands of the Council.

Information will be gladly afforded by the President, W. STANTON MOSES, M.A., 21, Birchington Road, N.W.; by MORELL THEOBALD, Hon. Sec., 62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.; or by any member of Council.

Subscriptions, which are due in January, should be paid to the Hon. Treasurer, HENRY WITHALL, Gravel Lane, Southwark.

Notices of all meetings appear regularly in "Light."

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF PSYCHICAL, OCCULT, AND MYSTICAL RESEARCH.

"LIGHT! MORE LIGHT!"—Goethe.

"LIGHT" proclaims a belief in the existence and life of the spirit apart from, and independent of, the material organism, and in the reality and value of intelligent intercourse between spirits embodied and spirits disembodied. This position it firmly and consistently maintains. Beyond this it has no creed, and its columns are open to the fullest and freest discussion—conducted in a spirit of honest, courteous, and reverent inquiry—its only aim being, in the words of its motto, "Light! more Light!"

Mesmerism, Trance, Clairvoyance, Thought-Reading, Apparitions, The Human "Double," Presence at a Distance, Haunted Houses, Communion with the Departed, Materialised Spirit Forms, The Spirit-Rap, The Spirit Voice, Spirit Writing, Automatic Writing, Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact, Theosophic and Mystic Doctrines, &c., &c.

To the educated thinker who concerns himself with any of these subjects, or with other questions of an occult character, "LIGHT" affords a special vehicle of information and discussion; and as the Editor has the co-operation of able contributors, of acknowledged experience and authority, whose opinions are deserving of permanent record, he confidently believes that the Journal is worthy of the cordial support of the most intelligent students of Psychological facts and phenomena.

Price 2d.; or 10s. 10d. per annum, Post Free.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXVI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Ghosts are in increasing demand. Ghost stories are found in novels, magazines, and newspapers. It was a sign of the times when a newspaper like the Daily Telegraph published, day after day, ghost stories from all parts of the country. Mrs. Crowe's "Night Side of Nature" was an early indication of the Spiritualist movement. The supply indicates the demand, the rising and increasing interest in what, in our ignorance of nature, we call the supernatural.

An American newspaper says: "Not a day passes without some such spectral appearance, or some wonderful fact in this inner realm of life, being duly chronicled and spreading from one newspaper to another. This is not sectional but national; it knows no North, no South, no East, no West, but reaches from the rocky coast of the Atlantic to the Mexican Gulf, the Golden Gate of the far Pacific, and to those distant woods where rolls the Oregon." Where one such incident found place in our newspapers twenty years ago, twenty are welcomed to-day and have twenty-fold the number of readers they had then."

America has been and still is in advance of us in practical or demonstrative psychology, partly because its Press is more free, more outspoken, less constrained than ours. Journals of the first rank habitually publish authentic accounts of spiritual manifestations, as they do any other matter of science or news. Thus the New York Tribune, whose founder was a Spiritualist, published some of the best reports ever given of Mr. Eglinton's sances in America; and in a recent number gives the following curious statement: Dr. Leland, who recently died in Georgia, was a great sufferer from asthma, and to all appearances died several times before the final dissolution took place. On more than one occasion his family made preparations for his funeral, and a day or two before his actual death he told a remarkable story of how he witnessed the arrangements. "Unable to lie down, I passed all my time in an easy chair. My body died several times. I, that is, my spirit, would go away from it, and, standing in an opposite corner of the room, would look back at the flesh and blood in the chair and wonder how I was ever induced to pass so many years in its company. 'Poor old body,' I thought, 'your troubles are nearly over. They will soon put you away under the ground, where you will be at rest for ever.' I saw my family gather about my old frame as it leaned back, dead, in the chair, and it gave me pain to see them weep. Then I would feel something pulling me toward my body again; I could not resist it, I was powerless, and in a moment I had taken possession of it. Then there was an instant of pain, and I opened my eyes and breathed. Each time this was repeated I was more reluctant to return to my body."

Spiritualism is giving us new ideas respecting inspiration. For good or evil, as we are disposed to one or the other, we may be influenced, and in some cases controlled by human spirits. The Christian Chronicle publishes a sermon in which it is admitted that Shakespeare was as truly inspired as Moses or Isaiah. "Christianity does not bring into disrepute any beautiful sentence found anywhere in Heaven or in earth."

The Christian Herald, which gives such wide publicity to the miracles of healing constantly taking place at the London and Liverpool "Bethshans," also gives its readers an account of the yet more obvious "miracle" of the iron ring on Mr. Husk's arm. It says: "A well-known West End physician, who held the hand of the medium when operated upon, [when the ring came upon his wrist] has thoroughly examined the ring microscopically, magnetically, and chemically, and the most sceptical of witnesses are satisfied that nothing short of a miracle has been accomplished by spiritualistic agency. The visitors are said to have included some persons in political, military, and scientific circles."

But the odd thing is that the Christian Herald is not bothered at all by it. It frankly accepts the fact and accounts for it—thusly: "The above is just one of many Satanic prodigies that may be expected in these latter days as manifestations of the evil spirits going forth from the devil working miracles (Rev. xvi. 13, 14). Many Spiritualists in the United States advocate the abolition of marriage, and the doctrine of Socialism. Some leading business men there constantly consult Spiritualist mediums, like Delphic oracles, for advice about their business enterprises. Satanic miracles are generally foolish, useless prodigies, exciting gaping wonder, but not really beneficent and useful like Christ's miracles."

There, that settles the matter! Men who wish to abolish marriage have iron rings put on their wrists, which no one can take off, while their hands are held fast. The Socialists will soon be going about with iron rings around their necks. "This modern miracle," says the article, "has been investigated by a number of scientific men, who have visited the wearer of the iron bracelet at his residence at Peckham Rye, where, on Good Friday, quite a levée was held."

But the "Satanic prodigies," the "manifestations of the evil spirits going forth from the devil" do not have it all to themselves. Go to the Bethshans meetings, 10, Drayton-park, Holloway-road, Highbury, any Sunday, Wednesday, or Friday, 3 and 6.30, and you will see. There is a similar Bethshan at 11, Great George's-square, Liverpool. And why not more of them?

At Highbury, we read in the Christian Herald, after much prayer, Mrs. Baxter spoke from Hebrews iv. 3, 4, and then called for testimony. I seem to have read somewhere that people were not heard for their much speaking, and that persons who were cured were strictly charged not to tell. "Other times other manners." At the Bethshans they are exhorted to tell; and here is the testimony on one sance. Neuralgia of eyeball, twenty-one months, entirely cured. Man given up by doctors, cured of two years' chronic catarrh, and toothache instantly removed by prayer. Measles and asthma ditto. Woman prayed the Lord to cure a scalded arm, and lay down. When she rose the scald was gone and the arm so completely healed that she went on with her scrubbing. Another sister said, "The Lord healed me of an indigestion of fifteen months' standing, after I was anointed in August last." And so on, of cases of long standing paralysis, internal ulcers, diseased liver, &c., &c.

The Christian World is just a little too credulous. It is not true that "the only thing that ever baffled Mr. Maskelyne is table-turning." It is not true that "he has been able to reproduce every other phenomena of Spiritualism." He is not more that "the table was not twisted up by his grandfather's spirit." And what is the sense of saying, as the great Exposer does, that he and his friends "produced movements of a heavy table, which we could not accomplish afterwards"? I have seen a heavy centre table with a man seated on it, rise about a foot from the floor and remain for some moments suspended in space, while the persons around stood and only touched its top with their four fingers, but how can I tell who "produced" such a phenomenon?

The curious thing is that religious newspapers should claim that their supernaturalism is of the Lord and ours of the devil, when it is evident that there must be like causes for like effects. The power of the human will over pain and disease has been abundantly shown for a century in mesmerism. That this controlling and curative force can be combined and concentrated in healing circles is well known. No Spiritualist can find any difficulty in accepting all the facts of the Bethshans, because the facts of spiritual manifestations are more varied and more wonderful.

Then we have the usual nonsense about "psychic or nerve force which neutralised the laws of gravitation." When a ponderous body rises from the floor from some invisible intangible influence, and answers questions by its movements, we have a force guided by intelligence and will, and that is a pretty good definition of personality. If the intelligence, controlling such force, says it is the spirit of my grandfather, how am I to prove that it lies? It becomes only a question of personal identity. Intelligent force claims to be my grandfather, the Christian Herald says it is an imp of Satan.

Word and Work is no wiser than the rest of them. A correspondent admits that there may be trickery in some cases, but that most of the manifestations are genuine and due to Satanic influence. Well! can orthodoxy do better for itself than to investigate and prove the existence and power of Satan? Word and Work is not sure that the magicians of Egypt were anything more than clever conjurers—the Maskelynes and Cooks of the period who were able to give a colourable imitation of some of the miracles, but failed in others, those of which they had no warning. It allows also that the appearance of Samuel “could not be due to diabolic agency.” What then? Witchcraft was punished with death then, as it was a century ago in England.

“To the subject of Spiritualism,” says Word and Work, “we may call attention at another time.” Thanks! but might it not be well to read up a little—Crookes, Wallace, Zöllner, for instance, and attend a few sances with reputable and accepted mediums? Or is any investigation needless—and possibly a little troublesome?

A Mr. Gowland has made a curious exhibition at Barrow in an attempt to expose Mr. Eglinton's psychography. A discussion followed, in which a gentleman present said: “They had certainly seen an exposure, not of Mr. Eglinton's performance, but of Mr. Gowland's ignorance.” Let me say that I have known Mr. Eglinton for about ten years, living for seven years under the same roof, and I have been a careful observer of nearly a hundred of his sances with a great variety of manifestations. I have had a hundred evidences of the reality of the most astounding phenomena, and never the slightest indication of dishonesty.

Mr. James Hamer on this occasion offered to give Mr. Gowland £5 if he would reproduce a single manifestation of Mr. Eglinton's under the same conditions. As I have possibly more than once observed—similar offers of from £50 to £1,000 by responsible gentlemen have been made for years—with no takers. The cleverest conjurer in the world would not undertake to “reproduce” one of the eight different manifestations described by Mr. S. C. Hall, for any reward that could be offered.

This reminds me that a conjurer in America, who some time ago gave his testimony to the genuineness of the manifestations, has found it more profitable to eat his words and turn exposé. This has led to a scathing exposure of himself in the Banner of Light. I was about as well acquainted with Ira and William Davenport, their comrade, Mr. Fay, and Dr. Ferguson, as one could be. I watched their manifestations in public and private. Mr. Ferguson was an Unitarian clergyman of high character, and made the sacrifices he did for Spiritualism simply because he held it to be the most important phenomenon of our time. I saw the manifestations tested by such men as the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, William Howitt, and many of the leading intellects of England. The time is coming when these pioneers in the movement will have justice done them.

“The work goes bravely on!” If the expositors can do nothing else, they certainly advertise Spiritualism and cause discussion in journals and society. A Mr. Alfred Gordon has been exposing in the Isle of Man. A Mr. Lockerby writes to the Isle of Man Times, declaring that the exposé is really a medium of a low order, and that similarly conditioned spirits help him to do his tricks. Rev. W. T. Hobson, a clergyman of the Established Church, writes from St. Barnabas' Parsonage, to assert the reality of witchcraft as condemned in the Bible, of which he declares Spiritualism to be a new development. Then the exposé Gordon writes a long letter asserting that Spiritualism is a gross imposture, which he feels it his duty to expose. So he avails himself of the opportunity to puff himself and his performances. Net result: general discussion of the whole subject.

Evidently, with our opponents, the diabolical theory is the most popular. A glimmering of common-sense shows that tricks and delusion do not account for the facts. Satan is satisfactory. He is fulfilling prophecy. If he is foolish enough to demonstrate his own existence and power, that is his business. The witches of the last and preceding centuries, out of pure vanity, risked being drowned, hanged, or burnt alive. Now Satan goes about exposing himself at spiritual sances. As no common fool would be so foolish, what can we say of him?

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?

By F. W. THURSTAN, M.A.

Your correspondent, “A. G. W.,” asks despairingly Cui bono? I do not think he quite knows what Spiritualism means. Considering how often the process of investigation into Spiritualism is mistaken, by beginners, for Spiritualism itself, it would be no use arguing on this question unless the term be thoroughly defined. For one may go to a thousand sances, and fancy himself thereby to be a Spiritualist, and yet not be one; and, on the other hand, go to but one sance, and no more, and yet be a thorough Spiritualist. For a man does not become a Spiritualist until he has realised fully the continued presence and aid of spiritual beings around him. Before that, he is only an investigator or a curiosity-hunter.

Spiritualism may be defined as a method psychic beings have communicating with physical beings, and the technical modern use of the term as a method of so communicating by special outward means, viz., to their physical bodies, by causing effects in their physical environments, or to their mental worlds by causing effects on their minds, instead of by the normal inward means of “quickening” their spirits and causing impressions and impulses to rise apparently spontaneously.

Now, taking this definition of Spiritualism, its advantages may be divided into two categories. First, to the physical beings concerned (i.e., ourselves); second, to the psychic beings (i.e., the “spirits”). Any thinker must see many advantages to physical beings by the “outward” method of inter-communication. Let me name some. (a) Because our inward spiritual natures are at present not developed enough, or else have fallen off too much to receive inward “quickening.” (b) Because this method is more potent with many persons of a material or mental, rather than an intuitive, temperament. (c) Because this class of persons are largely predominant at certain epochs like the present, and actually deny the existence of a spiritual nature. (d) Because realisation of the power and presence of spiritual beings by this means is more lasting and potent in its effects, as it comes from definite knowledge founded on the rock of facts. (e) Because the human mind at present is so sluggish to perceive the powers over itself and others which it can acquire by an intercourse with spiritual beings, and requires fact after fact, like blow after blow, upon its consciousness, before it can be aroused to a vital realisation that such an intercourse does exist. (f) Because when, by this means, this realisation is once established, the circumstances of material life are completely altered, our environments are consciously extended, bringing thereby new faculties of mind and adaptation; the friendless become conscious of a thousand new friends, the homeless of a thousand new homes, and so forth. (g) Because when new light and extension is brought before the consciousness, a great stimulus is given to self-improvement and new means with it of self-culture. Witness the many poor and educated persons who have developed high literary, oratorical, or artistic powers by the impulse and impressions of their spirit surroundings, realised as personal human friends, capable of inspiring their own ideas into another mind. The advantages of the modern spiritualistic means of intercommunication to the spirits themselves do not affect us so much. But, surely, unless we wish to be selfish, we ought not to ignore the certainty that all spirits, whether high or low, must get happiness from this method of aiding us in our days of childhood and weakness, and that some undeveloped spirits must at any rate welcome a possibility, by these new physical means, of learning from us, and amending the faults of their old physical existence.

Your correspondent, in finding fault with Spiritualism, because it has not as yet shown us a means for getting material knowledge rapidly, is making two common mistakes. First, he is confounding the immature attempts with an immature apparatus, with all the potentialities of the new discovery—something like the short-sighted persons who asked the cui bono of electric lighting when it was first discovered. He has no right to condemn circles and mediums for their unproductiveness until he has tried the effect of specially-selected circles and specially-trained mediums specially sitting for special results; and until he has discovered all the possible means and aids of communication with spirits, such as the arrangement of positive and negative poles and magnetisms, the use of subdued music, flowers, coloured light, moonlight, posture, vestments, as acting on the minds of sitters, and on their spirits, and thence on their spirit-attraction. His second mistake is in forgetting that there may be directing intelligences in the Unseen who forbid the revelation to mortals of material discoveries as unadvisable, inasmuch as it would tend to men neglecting their own inventive faculties and ignoring their powers of spiritual intuition.

I will only add, in conclusion, that a long and earnest historical research has convinced me that the outward means of communicating with the inner world are not a new discovery of Modern Spiritualism, but have always existed side by side with the inner method, and that is an argument that the psychic beings have, at any rate, always seen some advantage to be derived thereby.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

The subject of the president's paper at the opening meeting of this Society, on the 27th ult., was the Hermetic fragment entitled Koré Kosmon, the Virgin of the World. This is one of the Hermetic writings which, in conjunction with Mr. Edward Maitland, Dr. Anna Kingsford is editing for publication, by subscription, by Mr. R. H. Fryar, of Bath. The Egyptian element, she remarked, is more apparent in this book than in any other of the Hermetic writings. It consists of a dialogue between Isis, the Egyptian goddess, and her son, Horos: and its theme is the creation of the world, the genesis and incarnation of the soul, its metempsychosis and destiny. That the “virgin” intended is the soul is shown by the fact that the whole of the book turns on the soul's history, from its first association with matter, its ordeals, and its final deliverance. This last event is due to the intervention of two Divine personages, Osiris, the Saviour, and Isis, the Enlightener. The account of the soul's descent—called also its “apostasy” and “fall”—is in close agreement with Platonic and Kabbalistic doctrine, as also with the Greek and Christian, incarnation being represented as the result of an act of free-will on the part of the soul, which, moved by Desire—the Tanha of the Buddhists—voluntarily quits its appointed limits in the Divine spheres, and so entails on itself the penalty of an earthly existence. Empedocles, and others of the Pythagorean School, taught the same doctrine; and Macrobius, in his commentary on the “Dream of Scipio,” shows us the descending souls on their way to earthly conditions, passing, like Persephone, through the various abodes of Heaven, and receiving in each some special faculty.

The very title of this celebrated fragment is a revelation of the identity subsisting between the ancient wisdom-religion and the creed of Catholic Christendom. In both alike the soul—or feminine element, because the substance and “mother” of the man—is spoken of as a woman, and declared to be, in her essence, pure and immaculate, and therefore “ever-virgin.” Hence her emblem is water, maria, since water, however seemingly contaminated, is really pure, and only appears foul through that which it holds in solution. Called, in her descent, Eve, and subordinated to the mundane part, Adam, she becomes by her restoration Mary, and “Mother of God” in man. The Greek presentation gives, under the corresponding allegory of the “Rape of Persephone,” or Proserpine, all the details of the soul's history, in perfect accordance with the Bible and the Kabbala. The Hindus have the same doctrine, and that which they call Karma, namely, the character and destiny contracted in the course of existence, coincides with the Greek Hecate, or retributive justice, and the Christian “original sin.”

Until the soul falls into matter, she has no “Fate” or “Karma.” This is the result of time and manifestation. It is represented by the moon, who has two aspects, the benign and the malignant. Under the benign aspect this moon is Artemis, reflecting to the soul the Divine light of Phœbus; under the malign, she is Hecate the Avenger, hunting guilty souls from birth to birth, and outwitting death itself. To the innocent and chaste soul—the soul undefiled by traffic with matter—the moon is favourable. Hence Artemis is the patron of “virgins.” And in this aspect the moon is the Initiatrix, Isis the enlightener, because, through a beneficent Karma, the soul receives interior illumination, being lighted up by sacred reminiscences. Similarly, in the Kabbala, “The Tree of Good and Evil” has its root in Malchuth, the moon.

While by Persephone was denoted the soul, by Dionysos was denoted the spirit. Hermetic doctrine teaches a fourfold nature, both of the world and of man. Of this nature two elements are Divine and permanent, and two mortal and perishable. The former are the spirit and soul, and the latter the lower mind or sense-body, and the physical organism. The spirit and soul, respectively male and female,—in a mystical sense—remain throughout all the changes of metempsychosis, the same—indissoluble and incorrupt; but the body and lower intellect are renewed in each re-birth.

The spirit, or Dionysos, is of a specially Divine genesis, being the son of Zeus by the immaculate maiden, Koré-Persephoneia, herself the daughter of Demeter, or the parent and supermundane intelligence, addressed in the mysteries as the “Mother.” But although thus of heavenly origin, Koré participates more closely than her son in an earthly nature. “Hence,” says Proclus, “according to the divines who delivered to us the most holy mysteries, Persephone abides on high in those dwellings of the Mother, which she prepared for her in places inaccessible and exempt from the sensible world. But she likewise dwells below with Pluto, administering terrestrial concerns and supplying life to the extremities of the Kosmos.” Wherefore, while in one aspect Koré, the soul, is celestial and immaculate, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter, in the other she belongs to the lower world, and is the captive and consort of Hades.

The soul's redeemer and captain of salvation, Osiris—the Jesus of the Christian presentation—is represented as in all things instructed and directed by Hermes, whose special function is it to mediate between the inner and outer, and conduct souls from the “dark abodes.” He is the genius of the understanding, or Divine reason, the Nous of Platonic doctrine; and was regarded as the messenger or angel of the gods, descending and ascending to all extremes of being, because the understanding must search alike the depths and the heights, and know all things. Hence his investment with the fourfold panoply of the rod, the wings, the sword, and the cap, to denote respectively the science of the Magian, the courage of the adventurer, the will of the hero, and the discretion of the adept. The Greeks typified the starry or astral sphere (of which we hear so much in relation to things occult) by Argos, and represented Hermes as his slayer. By this they denoted the necessity of a trained understanding to enable men to escape delusions and the bonds of fate, to which all are subject so long as they remain beneath the power of the stars. Hence the function of Hermes as the deliverer of the soul.

The reading of the paper was followed by a discussion.

The Society meets every Wednesday at 4 p.m., until July 1st, at 22, Albemarle-street, W. Visitors will be admitted on presenting their cards.

TRANSITION.—We have to record the passing on of Mario Frederica Bodmer, the wife of J. J. Bodmer, who is well known to many London Spiritualists.—“In My Father's house are many mansions.”

MR. W. R. PRICE, medical mesmerist, will deliver a course of three lectures on the “Marvels of Mesmerism,” on Tuesday evenings, May 12th, 19th, and 26th, at the New Secular Hall, New Church-road, Camberwell. The chair will be taken by Mr. Rumble, at half-past eight, prompt. Amusing and interesting experiments upon subjects chosen from the audience, will follow at the close of each lecture. Afterwards, persons suffering from headache, toothache, or any other pain, will be immediately relieved under mesmeric treatment, free of charge. The doors will be open at eight. Admission, 3d.; front seats, 6d. Tickets for the course: front seats, 1s.; back seats, 6d., to be had at the Hall, and at 81, Wells-street, Camberwell.

MR. MASKELYNE'S ADMISSIONS CONCERNING PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

"C.C.M." writes in a recent number of the Pall Mall Gazette as follows:—"The public have been repeatedly told that Mr. Maskelyne is able to exhibit, by his own ingenuity, all the manifestations associated with the term Spiritualism, and have generally believed that he, at least, professes this ability. They are likely to be far more struck now by his personal experience of facts of this nature which he declares to be quite beyond the resources of his art, as well as by his earlier admission that he had 'never doubted' the great array of facts included in the report of the Dialectical Society to be genuine, than by the history of his adventures as a professional exposé of 'mediums.' I am glad to have elicited a repetition, at first hand, of testimony which will be very surprising and unacceptable in some quarters. I only regret that Mr. Maskelyne's 'twenty years' experience in investigating Spiritualism has had, by his own account, to be latterly conducted by deputy. Otherwise he would not, I must suppose, have offered explanations, which I can affirm positively to be entirely erroneous, of such phenomena as Slade's and Eglinton's slate-writing. But it is enough for the present that he has added his testimony to some facts of the gravest scientific importance, which have been systematically denied and derided. Mr. Maskelyne is not singular in this respect, other distinguished experts of his profession, as Bellachini, of Berlin, and Jacobs, of Paris, having given similar evidence—the former, by-the-bye, to Slade's slate-writing. It may not be irrelevant to add the little-known fact that the celebrated Robert Houdin admitted, after full personal investigation, the existence of a genuine faculty of clairvoyance, or at least of facts admitting no other explanation."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- JOHN RUMBLE.—The announcements are made.
C. C. M.—Thanks for MSS. Will appear next week.
E. M.—We will look up the matter in question and send it on in a day or two.
W. McDONALD.—Too late. Such reports must reach us by Tuesday morning, at latest.
F. E. BURR.—You are quite welcome to the plates. We send you the duplicate copy of "LIGHT."
C. J. ATKINSON.—Thanks for the duplicate numbers of "LIGHT," February 28th, which you so kindly sent us.
W. J. HUNT.—We should be very happy to comply with your wish were our columns not so crowded. As it is, we find it very difficult to make room for matter that is absolutely necessary.
DOUBTFUL.—Either name would be grammatically correct. With regard to your other inquiry, there is no law to prevent anyone, not falsely professing to have a medical degree or diploma, or assuming the style of "doctor," from offering to heal by means other than those recognised by medical science. There might, however, be danger from the law of false pretences, or possibly from the Vagrant Act. It would not be from the mere use of the word "psychical" for description; but if this word was used as a mark for a profession to heal by the aid of "spirits" and a jury (or magistrate, as the case might be) could be got to presume that this was not really believed in by the person professing it, the latter might be convicted like any other impostor. If our querist is both honest and cautious, we think there is not much risk. A hostile attempt would probably be made by sending an agent, who would pretend to believe in the power, and who would then give evidence. All genuine psychics should be on their guard against this device.

A DREAM.—Mr. Herbert Marsh, of 336, Second Avenue, New York, relates that in a dream he had last August 16th, he saw a man in a crowd who said, "I can give you some information you will be glad of if you will come to me." Mr. Marsh woke with a vivid impression of the face of the man. A week after he had to go to Coney Island. The boat was filled. Pushing through the crowd, he came in contact with a gentleman whose face was identical with that of his dream. Keeping him in sight until he had an opportunity of speaking, he told him of the singularity of his appearance coinciding identically with that of a dream he had a week before. The gentleman said it was certainly strange, for he could never have seen him personally; he had just come from Lima where he had lived for years. He further said that he was in New York on his way to England, that he was a native of Manchester, and his name Cathcart. Mr. Marsh then told him his, and that he lived in New York. "Marsh!" said he, "that was the name of an intimate friend of mine at Lima." Mr. Marsh said that he had a brother, W. Vogler Marsh, whom he had lost sight of for ten years. Mr. Cathcart said that was his friend's name, that he died at Lima last January, after acquiring property there, and that part of Mr. Cathcart's business was, according to his promise to his friend, to find his brother in New York, and this he was preparing to do when they met so strangely. With the information Mr. Cathcart furnished him Mr. Marsh went to Lima. He has just returned, having realised the property left by his brother.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Skepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months (this was written in 1883), had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambule,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science, to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHRONWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence—(a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able un-believers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his sense informed him. As stated above, there was no place, or chance of any legend or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertainable laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE "PASSAGE OF MATTER THROUGH MATTER," AND OTHER PHENOMENA.

By "M. D."

I invited the blind medium, Mr. Husk, to my house the other night, to have a better opportunity of inspecting the iron ring which still remains upon his arm. Compressing the bones of the hand, I was satisfied that there is no possibility of removing the ring. But it is also true that engineers, who have examined the so-called phenomenon, have succeeded in finding a perfectly natural explanation.

It is so simple, so obvious, that I wonder it did not occur to me the first moment I examined the ring and the hand. It is that for some reason, perhaps some medical superstition, the parents of Mr. Husk had the ring made and put on his arm when he was a little boy of eight or nine years, and that he has worn it ever since.

Every engineer, every person of common sense who understands "the well-known laws of nature" agrees that this is the only natural explanation. Against it we have only the word of Mr. Husk, an interested party, and that of Dr. Wyld, who says he had the ring made a few weeks ago, that he covered it with his private marks, and that while he held both hands of the medium, Husk, it was in some way placed upon his (Husk's) arm.

Of two things—one is certain. Either Dr. Wyld speaks falsely, or this ring is proof of one of the most astounding of miracles, which Mr. Matthew Arnold declares "do not happen." So I resolved to make some experiments, and see if there were any more miracles where this one came from. Having invited some sceptical friends to assist me, we had a séance. I held one of Mr. Husk's hands, and a lady I can trust—not a Spiritualist—held the other.

So, holding Mr. Husk, and all sitting around a table holding each other, there came to us other tangible persons, who talked with us, made a racket, opened and shut the pianoforte, sang and played their own accompaniments, and finally did something bearing on this question of the iron ring.

Two rings cut from a sheet of pasteboard—papier maché—prepared by one of our sceptics, lay upon the centre of the table, and while the lady and I held the hands of Mr. Husk, and our other hands were held by those next us on either side, one of the papier maché rings was placed on my wrist, and the other upon the wrist of the lady. A light was struck, and the fact was evident to all—provided that both of us had not conspired with Mr. Husk to deceive the others.

Of course, all this is quite familiar to every experienced Spiritualist. I have had a chair threaded upon my arm while holding the hand of Mr. Eglinton. I have had knots tied upon an endless cord. I have had writings and drawings made between two slates while I held them together in my hand, but it was only at this séance of the rings, placed in the same moment upon the arms of two persons, that I heard a materialised spirit sing a song and play his own accompaniment on the pianoforte.

As to the test of the iron ring, the explanation of the engineers utterly destroys it—provided that you set aside the testimony of Dr. Wyld, and his marks and photographs, of the smith who made the ring, of Mrs. Husk, who may be presumed to know whether her husband had a ring on his arm when he married her, and of all who have known him from his childhood.

The obvious answer of Messrs. Huxley and Tyndall, Ray Lankester and Bradlaugh, is that it is more probable that Dr. Wyld and his smith, and all the witnesses, should join in a lie and swear to it on "a stack of Bibles" than that any "law of nature"—particularly any "well-known law"—should be violated.

Let me say, without disparagement of any other, that I have found Mr. Husk, within his range, a very good medium for investigation. Being too blind to get about by himself, his wife goes with him, but she prefers to be absent from the séance so as to remove all question of her interference. You may make up your own party, sit down quietly and observe carefully what may come, in the same spirit in which you would observe any fact in chemistry or physiology. Any fool can watch the growth of a plant or animal, but the wisest philosopher cannot tell how it is accomplished. Any one who will take a little trouble can be satisfied of the existence and power of spirits.

Playing on a pianoforte by a spirit was a new experience to me, probably because my séances have usually been held in small rooms not provided with such an instrument. Mr. Eglinton's "Joey" is a capital performer. Mr. Home's spirits, when most carefully tested, played on a common bellows accordion, held by the bellows end in a wire cage, so that no "mortal" fingers could touch the keys. There are many records of spirits playing on locked pianos. My piano was not locked, but we heard it opened with a bang. The lid was even used to make "raps" and answer questions. At one time two spirits were playing a duet—at least, there were four hands playing. Tunes were also played on the "fairy bells," and answers to questions twanged upon it. It also flew about near the ceiling, playing prettily, and once seemed to leave the room—the one door being locked—and then return to it, but this may have been an illusion produced by skilful playing; but the playing itself was certainly not done by any "mortal."

INVESTIGATION. — With many the very rumour that Spiritualism is to be scientifically investigated raises a hoot of indignation. They say that science has already explained it as imposture. When scientific men have been asked to explain phenomena outside of the range of possible imposture, they have hitherto preferred to go on discoursing beside the mark, as if to those who have already made up their minds. We will not say "they are dumb dogs, they cannot bark"; they will not approach the hand stretched out to them for fear of being caught.—REV. H. R. HAWES.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

Plate III.—A MINIATURE HAND.

There is always some difficulty in proving the reality of a materialisation. With the exception of the few remarkable cases in which the process of "form-building" has been watched throughout, we have, as yet, little direct evidence that the forms appearing are individually distinct and existing apart from the medium. I do not mean that, to Spiritualists who have witnessed the various kinds of physical phenomena, including the different phases of form-manifestations, the reality of a materialisation is still an unsettled question. On the contrary, every investigator may convince himself of the undoubted fact that some forms are distinct entities. But the question is, is the mere presentation of a "form" sufficient to convince the ignorant, the inquirer, or the sceptic? No human being is born a Spiritualist. All have to be convinced, not by theories and assertions, but by plain, demonstrable facts, and there lies the chief difficulty. The universal notion of "spirit" is too different from what we witness in the séance-room; the majority of examples of form-manifestations are too human and earthly to convey the idea that we are beholding a denizen from the other world, who has only temporarily re-assumed the physical condition of existence. Besides, the facts with which the careful investigator has made himself familiar, and the theories by which these facts are explained, are to the uninitiated, if not perfect absurdities, at least flat contradictions, or violations of every known law of nature. However, my object is not to allude to difficulties in the way of converting the inquirer, but to invite inquiry by pointing out facts. This accomplished, conviction of their reality rests with the observer himself. The little hand, represented in Plate III., is one of those unique specimens of spirit manifestation which must put our antagonists, the quasi-scientific authorities, altogether out of court. There is here no possibility of trickery, no reason to suppose confederation on the part of the medium, and very little chance to arrive at an explanation by the supposition of delusion on the part of the observer. This spiritualistic marvel is inimitable, and no means can be devised to account for a similar phenomenon but that of superhuman agency. I do not venture to formulate any speculations as to "how" it has been produced, but will simply state under what circumstances this little hand was exhibited, and confine my remarks to a mere quotation from my records of the séances at which it was observed.

On Sunday, September 9th, 1883, I attended a séance with Mr. Husk. There were fourteen persons present, all Spiritualists. Amongst the more usual manifestations that occurred during the evening, was the exhibition of a hand, differing from that of the medium by its smaller dimensions, and by its being partly covered by "drapery." The "form" (a bust) of "Irresistible" had been previously noticed over the table, but we did not then observe to whom, i.e., to what "spirit," the hand belonged, on account of the latter being placed on a small luminous slate, the light of which was not sufficient to show the surroundings.

However, "Irresistible" informed us that the hand which formed the subject of discussion was actually his, but that, accidentally, it had "turned out" a little smaller than on other occasions. This remark caused considerable surprise amongst the circle, because the prevailing idea entertained by all present was, that every materialised "spirit" form must, in order to establish an individuality, always represent its particular type, and be invariably similar to an antecedent appearance. But our curiosity was still further aroused by "Irresistible's" promise that he would show us his powers of modifying the shape and dimensions of his material hands, by making one the size of a rat's paw. After a few moments' delay, we noticed a streak of light, bright enough to distinguish the surrounding quantity of "drapery," slowly moving over the table. This was the larger luminous slate (two or more were kept) which passed, light downwards, over the polished wood, the reflection of which produced the streak of light above-mentioned. All heads—fourteen in number—were now turned towards the faintly illuminated spot still visible in the centre of the table, when suddenly the slate was turned over, light upwards, showing a minute object moving near the upper edge. At first glance it looked like a big fly or a thick-legged spider, but on closer examination proved to be a human hand with the fingers moving. It was a perfectly animated living creation, and not a mere mass of artificially constructed human flesh or other substance resembling a hand. Upon request, the fingers were spread, closed, and the hand turned over, showing also the inside of it. I must here observe that the table around which fourteen persons were assembled was a round one, measuring four and a-half feet in diameter, and that the little human hand with the remaining arm and bust were moving over the centre of it, in front of the medium; also that the hands of the sitters were linked. Consequently the phenomena was witnessed under test conditions, and under the very eyes of every person present. Besides, the luminous slate, with the miraculous object on it, was placed by turns in front of all the sitters—so close, indeed, that the "drapery" covering the fore-arm rested upon our hands. The same phenomenon was exhibited on four subsequent occasions, each time the size of the hand differing from a rat's paw to that as represented in Plate III. My object in selecting for illustration the larger example was to facilitate the execution of the drawing, and especially the printing, which would probably have failed to give a true representation if a smaller figure had been chosen.

On another occasion, a somewhat similar phenomenon was observed, viz., a hand of about twice the size of the figure in Plate III., but still smaller than a new-born child's hand, with several fingers in addition to the normal number—in fact, there was, to use "Irresistible's" own words, "a bunch of them." Unfortunately, this abnormal manifestation collapsed almost immediately after its introduction, and we had but a short glance at it.

At Alphonse Cahagnet's Tomb (April 12th) orations were delivered. One speaker knew him, a chair-turner, thirty-eight years ago, as a close student of animal magnetism. He was endowed with a great gift of developing lucidity in his somnambule subjects, and in some, very sensitive, the ecstatic condition. The earliest fruit of his studies and experiments was the "Arcanes de la Vie Future," the accepted dedication of which to the renowned Baron Du Potet bears the date of 1847. In this his first work he records conversations—principally through the medium of his clairvoyant and clairaudient somnambules—with spirits of the departed of various conditions. These records are accompanied by incontestable proofs. Another volume followed in 1851. After these he published at intervals of a few years, the "Abrégé des Merveilles du Ciel et de l'Enfer," the "Sanctuaire du Spiritualisme," the "Lumière des Morts," the "Révélation d'outre Tombe," and others. Some of his works have been translated; the English circulated in America before the advent of Modern Spiritualism. In the meantime he conducted a periodical, Le Magnétisme Spirituel, from 1847 to 1851, when he converted it into the Encyclopédie Magnétique Spirituelle, and continued it till 1862. He always spoke of himself to the last as a student, and claims to be still a student in the invitation to his funeral, very poetically written before his departure by himself.—La Lumière.

PHENOMENA IN PARIS.

(FROM A LETTER IN Le Messager.)

I have attended some séances here (Paris) at the introduction of my relative, Madame Coisault.

After the preliminary examination of the room and medium, we formed a chain and extinguished the light. Presently I felt something laid upon my knee; then my fingers were opened and made to close upon what felt like a stem of, judging by the perfume, a rose; and so it was; then my head was taken between two hands, and pressed against what felt like the bust of a woman. Madame C. sat next to me, and she said she had the same experience, and thought it was her sister-in-law, Madame Galvaing, and that she had asked mentally that if it were so she would press the medallion at her neck, and that she had done so.

Then little lights moved about in all directions; two remained stationary in front of me, right and left; then two hands took my chin, raised my face, and kissed me. I told Madame C., and said that I should like to see who it was. Scarcely had I uttered the words, than two hands turned my head towards the light to my right, and from this, other little lights detached themselves, behind which I perceived a form; the head was indistinct, but, the light increasing, the features became recognisable; I exclaimed, "It is my Uncle Lumet!" Madame C. recognised him too. There he certainly was, smiling at us, every feature plain, with his long white beard, and clad in a white robe. We told him how well we recognised him. He kissed us both and disappeared. I turned to the other light, but that was for a manifestation to my left-hand neighbour. I could see, however, a beautiful female face.

I heard others of the circle express words of recognition. Flowers were put into the hands of all; bells were rung in accompaniment to our singing; and a musical-box was floated, playing, over our heads.

At a subsequent séance with the same medium I was accompanied by one of my nephews, along with Madame C. During other manifestations, a spirit stood in front of us, waving his hands from below upwards, seeming thus to gather light at the ends of his fingers, and then worked them about before his face. My nephew and I both called out at the same moment, "It is Uncle Lumet!" The spirit placed one of his illuminating hands upon ours, joined together, and we recognised its peculiar form. Madame C. also recognised him, and hoped he would say a word to her. The spirit kissed me and my nephew, pressed Madame C.'s hand, and disappeared. The spirit of Madame Galvaing came as before; she drew my head towards that of her sister-in-law, and tenderly embraced us together.

A short time afterwards I attended another séance with Madame C. and her mother-in-law. Before the séance, thinking of my brother, I said, mentally, that if he could not make himself visible I hoped he would be able to write his name on my forehead. At the séance the spirit of my brother did make himself visible, and then, with his finger, wrote his full name on my forehead; then, having kissed me, he shook hands with Madame C. and her mother, who had recognised him. Then the spirit of Madame Galvaing presented herself, kissed her mother and sister-in-law, shook hands with me, and disappeared. Spirits appeared to others of the circle.

The medium was the same at each séance, it was Madame Babin.

Paris, January 27th, 1885.

MARIE ESSAULT.

OUR readers will learn with pleasure that the health of the celebrated medium, Henry Slade, is sufficiently re-established to permit his resuming his holding séances. He has been suffering from prostration of strength and spasms. Dr. Elliott, of New York, has been his physician, but the guides of the medium made suggestions in the treatment sometimes through his lips, sometimes by the alphabet and raps.—Le Messager.

AUTOMATIC WRITING.

In response to your invitation for notes of cases which prove that automatic writing is due to inspiration from "spiritual" beings outside the automatic writers, and not proceeding from the cerebration of their own brains, as Mr. Myers' theory of telepathy would imply, I beg to give your readers my experience in this respect.

At the first séance which I attended, I was told by the medium that I possessed certain mediumistic gifts, and was invited to cultivate them.

Being anxious to test the truth of this, I procured a planchette, and, on the second trial, I was fortunate enough to get readable writing, and intelligent answers to my questions. As, however, the answers thus far were such as might have proceeded unconsciously from my own brain, I requested my invisible friends to give me proofs that would convince me of the real source of the communications.

Being desirous of developing my mediumistic gifts, I asked whether I could help in quickening the development, and, if so, what means I ought to adopt.

The planchette answered that I could indeed help by studying and reading books.

On asking what books I ought to read first, I was told that the works of Mivart would be the best to begin with. Not knowing this name, and never having heard any name like it, I concluded that there must be a mistake. I asked for a repetition of the name, which was given twice more.

On inquiry from several friends I found that such works were not generally known, but on looking through the list of books of Mudie's library I found to my great delight the very name, "George St. Mivart."

I have read some of these works, "Lessons from Nature," "Nature and Thought," "On the Genesis of Species," "Contemporary Evolution," and have found them to be just the books which would give me the necessary preliminary instructions as to man's spiritual nature.

Before concluding, I beg to state, that when writing I was alone in the room, and that when I received this information I had not spoken to anybody about my intention of testing spiritual phenomena, or studying to acquire the necessary understanding, so that it could be neither the outcome of unconscious cerebration of brains at a distance, nor of my own brain, since I was perfectly ignorant of the existence of works by such an author.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

T. N. (Calcutta).—Remittance to hand, for which accept our best thanks.

A. H. SYKES.—Your letter of the 27th ult. was duly received, and in due course would have appeared in "LIGHT" for May 9th, but, its contents necessitating inquiry, it had to be deferred until the current issue. It would have appeared to-day had you not by your letter of the 11th inst. taken it out of our power to insert it. It is not usual with gentlemen to threaten the conductor of a journal, and until you withdraw your offensive letter we absolutely refuse to give you a hearing. When you approach us in a proper and courteous manner we shall be ready to give you the same opportunity for stating your views as we accord to all opponents.

La Petite France (Tours) of March 17th, reporting at length some demonstrations, by M. Donato, of the psychical effects induced by magnetisation, says that time was when he would have been burnt as a wizard. It concludes: "Whatever Academies of Science may say, it is incontestable that magnetism lets in light altogether new to those who are now exercising their minds upon the gravest problems affecting humanity."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Psychical Society and Mr. Barkas.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle—a name well-known to Spiritualists—in his recent address before the Alliance, as recorded in your journal, sums up a long series of remarkable phenomena now concluded. It is a case which deserves the attention of the Psychical Society. I do not see on what plea they can refuse to investigate this case. Here is a man who has "carefully investigated these phenomena for upwards of thirty years," and if he possesses ordinary intelligence and derives no profit from such manifestations, he is surely entitled to a hearing.

The question is, whence are the answers obtained—from the mind of the lady medium, who had received only a slipshod semi-education, if that be not a too favourable account, or from the mind of some invisible person? That the answers came from some mind will, I presume, not be doubted. They range over a vast variety of subjects, and are in a large proportion of a positive and scientific character. They are not of a kind that admit of thought-transference at the moment, nor can any possible or rational extension of the telepathic theory account for them.

It is desirable that it should be investigated at once, while Mr. Barkas is alive, and the lady medium too, and while those who attended the sances, or as many as possible of them, are within reach. To defer the inquiry till a more convenient season would only betray a desire to shirk it altogether.

And if the Psychical Society takes it up, I hope it will do so in a thorough-going manner, and pledge its own credit and honour for the result, be it what it may. We want a verdict after full investigation, and in open court. They have hitherto tackled these cases in a semi-official manner. Just as governments have semi-official journals and semi-inspired writers who can be disavowed if convenient, so the Society gives a quasi-authority to one or two persons to investigate a case, but does not make itself responsible for their proceedings, or even think it necessary to publish a report of them. So it was in the Eglinton case. Two or three persons obtained only negative results, and then the whole case collapsed. This is most unsatisfactory. The "Matter through Matter" case was little better. Here Mr. Gurney delivered his verdict without confronting the principal agents or any examination of them. It seemed to him quite sufficient to view the case through the haze of vague generalities.

Nor is the Morell Theobald case at all more reassuring. Here Mr. Podmore presented himself at the house "as a member of the Psychical Society," as if that was sufficient credentials, and as if the Society could be made responsible on that mere fact for his judgment and discretion. Well, he despatched the whole case in an hour's cursory survey. The writing itself presented difficulties which he did not answer. Has he tried whether he can write on a ceiling with a pencil stuck on a broomstick? But, believing all this, there is a moral difficulty in this case which he was bound to face, and in some way account for. If Mr. Theobald is to be believed, these acts were repeated daily for six months or more. What incredible industry, what astonishing perseverance in the work of fraud, and without any hope or possibility of reward! This miraculously industrious and persevering maid-servant laboured in the cause of fraud as good men labour for the rewards of virtue, and for no return but the consciousness of her own fraud and baseness! Really this case ought to be taken up anew and thoroughly prosecuted. The veracity of Mr. Theobald and his family ought to be subjected to the severest tests. A touch-and-go treatment like Mr. Podmore's will not do.

Be all this as it may, it does not shed light on the Barkas case. We have a right to demand that this case shall be investigated by the Psychical Society, and with its full authority. At present there is a widely spread feeling among its members that it is practising a policy of evading difficulties, not of overcoming them; and that it has not the courage either of its mission or its pretensions.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

I might have added above, in regard to the Husk-Wyld case, that Mr. Gurney has since partly atoned for his remarkable laches in the first instance, but only partly, for he has not answered Dr. Wyld on any one point, though assisted by the adroit evasiveness of Mr. Maskelyne.

[We again give place to correspondence of this nature because it is typical of communications which now constantly reach us, and not because we think the Society for Psychical Research is holding aloof from the investigation of Spiritualism. One of its main objects is the examination of "spiritual" phenomena, and no doubt the officers of the Society will, in due time, allay the apprehensions of correspondents like Mr. Haughton by a definite announcement of its intentions in this direction.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

A Remarkable Private Seance.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I happened to see in a recent number of "LIGHT" a letter from Dr. Wyld referring to the iron ring which has created some interest in psychic circles, in which he considers that ring to be one of the very few examples, if not the only one, of a permanent and lasting manifestation.

I think that the account of a seance which I shall give may prove interesting to your readers, on account of its materialistic nature.

I will preface my account by stating that the circle within which our numerous sances have taken place, is a small private one, consisting of relations and intimate friends, in which we have never had a professional medium of any description. Our first seance originated in a whist party, becoming tired of that game, trying "a little table turning," more for fun and variation than anything else, which "table-turning" developed itself, in a (to us) most surprising manner, into a highly satisfactory seance. On various subsequent evenings we went more thoroughly into the subject, and have succeeded in obtaining intelligible writing, drawing, and marks on slates under test conditions, as well as other manifestations.

On the particular evening I am going to give an account of, our usual party of five persons (two ladies and three men) met and sat down in semi-darkness. As we were all intimate friends we had no fear of trickery. Very soon the table became agitated, trembling in almost a human manner, and darting about hither and thither in the air and on the floor. On inquiring our visitant's name, a long Egyptian name was spelt out, and the spirit in course of conversation informed us that he was a murderer. We then asked for some writing on our slate, which was placed on the table, covered with a thick cloth, outside of which cloth our hands rested. After waiting for some time, during which the table gyrated about the room, we turned up the light and proceeded to examine the slate.

No mark, however, was visible upon it, and we were just feeling disappointed, when I saw a piece of paper protruding from the partially removed cloth. I opened it. Its contents were a large nail imbedded in blood, which glued it to the paper which enveloped it, the paper also on the inside being smeared with the same horrible dried-up substance. There was still another element in this surprising manifestation; a long, silky, golden, woman's hair was stuck fast with the coagulated blood on the nail. On inquiry we were informed by the Egyptian that the murder took place in Cairo, and that the nail was driven in to the head of the woman, his sweetheart, whose hair we had seen.

I took charge of the paper and its ghastly contents, and have them now in a drawer in, I am sorry to say, the very prosaic neighbourhood of my shaving utensils.

To continue, the remainder of the seance was very violent. The ladies left the room, as it was becoming too much for them. I and my two male friends were pulled about from behind, Mr. B's eye-glasses were knocked off, all of us pinched in various parts of the body, a chair rose in the air, and came down on my shoulders as I was endeavouring to play the "Ghost Melody" on the piano in the dark (which after that intimation I desisted from), a sofa came out from the wall almost into the centre of the room, and went back again (we being at the table), bad language was afterwards found written on a piece of paper lying in a distant corner, blue lights hovered about, the table cloth was snatched like lightning from off the table beneath our hands, and then put on again, poor Mr. B's bald head was fingered over, and his hands knocked off the table. We began to think that perhaps we had better stop the seance, or get another spirit.

We determined on the latter, and I politely requested our

SPIRIT IDENTITY.

(From Facts of April, 1885.)

When young, between 1835 and 1839, my avocation took me to the islands of the Pacific Ocean. On board our ship some natives of these islands served, and from them I learnt a good deal of their language. For forty years I have been home, and have been a member of a church. I am now sixty-eight years of age. From a desire to know the truth, I have attended many spiritual sances, and have kept notes of them for the last two years.

February 23rd, 1883.—I was at a seance at Mrs. Allen's of Providence, Rhode Island, when a spirit of a Pacific islander materialised himself, and I recognised him by his describing his fall from the rigging, by which he damaged his knee, leaving a permanent enlargement of it; at this seance he placed my hand upon this knee, materialised into its old state. He was called on board Billy Marr.

April 6th.—On this occasion I brought with me a piece of cloth made by the natives, from the bark of the tapper tree, which I had had forty-five years. He held it in his hand, and called it by its native name.

September 1st.—I, with my wife, was called up to the cabinet, and while in front of it, a spot of white appeared on the floor, gradually developed into a materialised form, and was recognised by me as my sister, who blew kisses to me. Then the form of my first wife came. After this the curtains parted, and there stood a woman in a Pacific islander's dress of forty-five years ago, as remembered by me. She talked with me in her native tongue.

September 18th.—This woman materialised again; she shook hands with me; told me that she was of New Hever, one of the Marques group. She called to my mind how she was startled by the firing of the ship's gun when she came on board with her mother, the Queen of the island.

September 29th.—She came again. This time Billy Marr also materialised. He said he had induced her to come. He called her Yeney.

October 17th.—At Mrs. Allen's seance the Queen came, gave her name as Perfenev. She walked around with me, allowed me to cut off a piece of her dress, which was exactly like a piece of the native cloth I brought home forty-five years ago.

November 5th.—At the same medium's, Perfenev allowed me to cut four pieces from her dress, as specimens, while she held it. It corresponded exactly with the piece I cut at Mrs. Allen's. She then reminded me of the native food—"powey," sat down on the floor, and went through the action of taking "powey" from a dish with her fingers.

March 7th, 1884.—At a seance at Mrs. Allen's, I met Judge Cross, who was interested in these foreign spirits, and examined their clothing.

April 27th, 1884.—My spirit-wife came and announced Perfenev, who next appeared, dressed in a white silk fabric, with head and waist ornaments.

May 9th.—She came dressed as before, and danced.

June 22nd.—At Dewitt Hough's seance, Onsett Bay, my spirit-sister came; then Perfenev, with her daughter; she greeted me in her native tongue. I led her forward to the circle; she dematerialised while I held her hand. At this seance, the editor of Facts was present.

In December, 1884, at Blackstone Hall, Providence, Mr. Edgar Emerson, test medium, whom I never saw before, said: "I see two foreign spirits, mother and daughter." He stated things which took place with me in the Pacific Islands, forty-five years ago.

I close by expressing a hope that what I have related may induce others to investigate. Our spirit friends do all they can to help our investigations.

JAMES N. SHERMAN, Rumford, Rhode Island.
March, 1885.

I should state, in conclusion, that the same night one of our party, not by any means an imaginative person, was awakened by some noise in the bedroom, and over the looking-glass saw the bust of a good-looking dark young man, of Egyptian appearance, with rather a sad expression. This remained visible for a moment, and then disappeared.

I have no wish to enter into a correspondence on the subject, as I have little spare time, but I shall be happy to furnish the names and address of the other persons present for the verification of the above account.

I enclose my name and address as a guarantee, but not for publication.—I am, sir, yours obediently, 5th May, 1885. W. W. H.

A Warning of Danger.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Perhaps a few incidents which have occurred to me in sances held with Mr. Eglinton may interest your readers, as I have not lately seen exactly similar phenomena described. In May, last year, I paid a visit to Mr. Eglinton, to whom I was a total stranger. Waiting for a friend who had promised to join us, we entered into a conversation on different matters, when Mr. Eglinton suddenly said, "I hear the name of 'Frances,' it is e s." "Is there any other name?" "Mary." This was the name of a sister who died at the age of seven, many years before Mr. Eglinton was born, and I do not think her full name is at present remembered by any of her family, with the exception of her sisters, as she was called by another. In a subsequent seance a long letter signed in the full name was addressed to me on the slate. Several names of long departed relations were also given, of whom the medium could have known nothing, but when these appeared Mr. Eglinton told me facts connected with them which he said came instantly to him by clairaudience.

A few days ago I had a third seance. Several names of deceased friends, as before, had appeared on the slates, when the Christian name of a dear relative, still in earth-life, was written. On inquiry into the meaning of this, the reply was, "Tell her to beware of danger." Question: "What danger?" Answer: "Tell —" (the full name) "not to go out driving for the next three weeks." The lady is a stranger, even by name, to the medium. I had reason to believe that she was not in the habit of driving out at the present time; therefore the idea of any danger had not entered my mind. After a long letter on other subjects, from a guide of the medium, had appeared in the closed slates, held above the table by Mr. Eglinton and myself, in full view of two friends present, the medium took a single slate and held it under the flap of the table, where I could see the half of it distinctly. Suddenly, with a loud report, the slate crashed up from the centre and broke, frame and all, into fragments in his hand. He told me afterwards that he had no premonition of the phenomenon, but felt a sharp nervous shock in the spine, which ran down his arm, the slate receiving the whole of the force from him. His hand was not injured.

Now for the warning. On my return home I wrote to my relation an account of it, as I felt this course was best in any case, although it might be unnecessary. She replied that she believed she had cause for alarm, as her husband had recently bought a new horse, which she feared was a very dangerous one, but as this was contrary to his opinion she would have ventured to drive with him; after this warning she certainly would decline to do so. I trust this may save both from severe accident, especially as I have since heard that the horse caused the death of its late owner. This may show there is some little "use in Spiritualism" to those who accept it kindly. The friendly warning scarcely seems the "work of an evil spirit."—I am, dear sir, yours truly,
J. C.

MR. E. W. WALLIS will lecture at Cavendish Rooms, on Sunday, May 17th. His subject will be "The Practical and Religious Value of Spiritualism."

THE NEW HOME OF THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you permit me to inform those of your readers who are also members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, and those also who will, I hope, join us, that the Council has taken chambers at 16, Craven-street, Strand, which will be made at once available as a reading-room and library? There Spiritualists will find the large collection of books on occult subjects, once the property of the late Central Association of Spiritualists, available for their use. It is proposed to give full facilities for access to this library so that members may make a practical use of it; there also Spiritualists can see the various magazines and journals devoted to Spiritualism, the foreign papers, and whatever of interest from time to time may come into the possession of the Council. There, finally, friends from abroad will be welcome, and be enabled to make the acquaintance of our members.

It has been a not infrequent inquiry amongst our members, Why does the Alliance not secure for itself a home and throw it open for the use of Spiritualists? The answer is simple. We are resolute to adhere to the pledge given at our formation, viz., to live within our means. We have done this scrupulously; and it is only now that the Council has felt justified in expending the modest sum necessary for opening these chambers. The social meetings, so highly appreciated by our members and their friends, we felt bound to continue, and the funds entrusted to us admitted of little else in the way of expenditure.

Even now we are not rich enough to afford a secretary. Yet, without someone who can be regularly present in the rooms, we cannot open them for more than a portion of the day. Members of Council will endeavour to make arrangements for personal attendance during some evening hours, but the full value of the reading-room and library cannot be had until our funds permit of the engagement of a suitable secretary to answer inquiries, give out books, and keep open the room for the convenience of members at all hours. I hope that the time is not far distant when we shall find ourselves with funds that will enable us to take this very necessary step. A hundred new members would set us free to do this; two hundred would enable us to do other desirable work, and to make the London Spiritualist Alliance a centre of much-needed activity. Till that good time comes we must be content to do what our funds permit.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

THE PRESIDENT OF THE L. S. A.

HERR SAMUEL BELLACHINI.

We learn from Spiritualistische Blätter of the 16th April, that the celebrated conjurer, Samuel Bellachini, has deceased in his fifty-ninth year. His solemn declaration before a notary at Berlin, on December 6th, 1877, that "the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of the surroundings, including the table, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening, and I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations or by mechanical apparatus, and any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation, is absolutely impossible," will be in the recollection of our readers.

Spiritualistische Blätter seems to be under a misapprehension when it adds, in its obituary notice, "He (Bellachini) will now regret the cowardice (Feigheit) which caused him later to say that he had only given his evidence for Slade out of professional sympathy!" This improbable report was set about in the lifetime of the late Professor Zöllner, who inquired into it, and refers to it at p. 199 of his "Transcendentale Physik," as follows, after setting forth Bellachini's notarial evidence:—

"I may here mention a report which has been spread about in Leipzig and other places in reference to the trustworthiness of the above testimony. Herr Bellachini, it is said, being last year in a North-German watering place, spontaneously contradicted his testimony. He is said to have declared that he gave it only from sympathy with Slade as a fellow professional, and out of complaisance to some persons in high position, in order to protect Slade from further molestations by the police and by the Berlin literary rabble (Pöbel). On this rumour reaching me, I disbelieved it, as well because I took Herr Bellachini, who has access to the Imperial Court, for an honest man, as also because I could not suppose a conjurer to be so stupid as to expose himself by such a contradiction of his notarial testimony, to the risk of a public prosecution for a knowingly false declaration. And my presumption has been completely confirmed. Hearing that my colleague, Professor Stobbe, rector magnificus of Leipzig University, had met Bellachini at the watering place referred to, I questioned him personally as to the supposed contradiction. He at once declared to me most positively that there had been nothing of the sort, whatsoever (dass von einem solchen Widerruf gar keine Rede gewesen sei), but that Bellachini, with whom he had himself repeatedly conversed, had only said that under certain conditions of his own choosing—not under those with Slade—he could imitate the occurrences taking place in Slade's presence. He added that he should abstain from such imitations till after Slade had left Europe, lest they should be mistaken by the public for 'Exposures.'"

THE Hartford Times (Hartford, Conn.) of March 16th, copies the record in full of the materialisation séance of February 28th, Mr. Eglinton the medium, reported in "LIGHT" by Mr. Farmer.

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISM, 43, MANOR-PLACE, WALWORTH.—Good, stable progress is being made by those who meet at this place. Sunday after Sunday spiritual instruction is received. A number of strangers who had known nothing of Spiritualism previously, were present on Sunday evening last, and listened with delight to the trance discourses delivered through Miss Keeses by her spiritual teachers. The subject was "Immortality," and they showed that the conception of it which Spiritualism gave to the world was far higher and nobler than any which the world had previously received. On Sunday next Mr. Walker, of Edmonton, will be the speaker, and we hope South London friends will be present in large numbers to welcome him.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXVII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

From the cheapest newspapers to the half-crown reviews in Europe, America, all over the civilised world, we have evidence of the increasing interest in Spiritualism. The one human interest that is above all others is the life to come,—the proofs, now so widely given, of a continued existence. This has, indeed, been always taught, always believed by great numbers; but in this age of scientific scepticism we need proofs of spirit life and power, and what we need we have.

It does not so much matter whether the articles in reviews, magazines, and newspapers are favourable to or against Spiritualism, or serious or ridiculous. The important thing is that they awaken interest, set men to thinking, induce them to inquire, and then to investigate. No more is needed. The investigator is sure to be convinced. It is not a question of listening to a preacher who persuades, but of examining facts that prove. It can be safely declared that no man of science, and no person of common-sense, has ever made a thorough examination of the phenomena of Spiritualism without being convinced of their reality.

This is one reason why Spiritualists are so quiet, so little anxious, so far from engaging in an active propaganda of their faith. Were the reality of a continued existence only a theory, or only a matter of faith, we might be anxious to persuade men of its truth. Being a matter of observation, and sure to be known to everybody sooner or later, we do not take any special trouble about it.

Only, of course, any truth which brings us consolation we are naturally glad to bring to others. We desire that all should know the truth, because every truth is useful. It is safer and better to know what is, and, as far as can be known, what will be. Why shut our eyes to what is before us? An honest soul is prepared for everything that can come to it. An honest soul has nothing to fear and everything to hope.

What a Spiritualist may reasonably do is this, so, at least, it seems to me. He may take some trouble to let others know what is such comfort and hope to himself. He has indubitable evidence that those he has known and loved on earth still live, and love him, and tenderly watch over him. He knows this as a demonstrative fact, evident to his senses. Common benevolence must induce him to make such a fact as widely known as possible.

As a rule the most intelligent men are the most philanthropic. A philanthropist makes sacrifices for others. He does not mind ridicule or misapprehension. He does not keep any truth to himself which may be a benefit to others. Once convinced, he does not join the Nicodemus Club and keep his knowledge and comfort to himself. The progress of humanity, and all reformations which can increase the sum of human happiness, rest upon this natural kindness of the human heart—this desire to communicate whatever can give happiness to those around us.

What other motive could have induced the scientific investigators of Spiritualism to publish the results of their long and careful examinations? I hold the testimonies of such men as Crookes, Zöllner, Wallace, the two Earls of Dunraven, Varley, Robert Chambers, and all the men of science in Europe and America, who have given their testimony to the facts of Spiritualism, simply heroic, and, in the best sense of the word, philanthropic.

Well, it may seem a little odd to give men so much credit for taking a little trouble to know what is true, and then having the courage to tell what they know. But consider the vast number of men who condemn without a hearing, who prefer ignorance to knowledge, who, rather than face a little ridicule, or even passive unbelief, keep to themselves the most important facts of human experience.

And these are not the worst,—we mean, the most obstructive to the progress of knowledge. Nine-tenths of the professed teachers of Spiritualism in the creeds of Christendom ignore or oppose the phenomena which demonstrate its fundamental principle. The clergy, as a rule, have less fear of Agnosticism, Materialism, Atheism, than of phenomenal Spiritualism.

Let us take an Anglican or Roman Catholic. Here we have more elastic creeds. What with the High, Low, and Broad Church, by law established, and the expansive catholicity of Rome, there is plenty of tolerance for very wide divergencies. Rome has always been phenomenal. Rome claims an unbroken series of miracles and spiritual manifestations. There is scarcely any phenomenon in modern Spiritualism that does not find a close resemblance in the lives of the saints. Rome does not deny the facts of Spiritualism, though individual priests may declare them to be diabolical—agreeing, for once in a way, with our most ultra Protestants.

But individual priests, bishops, cardinals even, may not speak with the voice of the Church. As a matter of fact they may widely differ on all matters not "of faith." The late Cardinal Wiseman knew a good deal about Spiritualism, and was far from denouncing it. The present Cardinal Manning is not so charitable. The Church, of course, has made no decision. How can it? Each individual case must be examined by itself, and decided, if any action is needed, upon its own merits. Rome does not go out of her way to find difficulties, whatever some of her priests and prelates may do.

And Rome is wise enough to see that her greatest danger is not Spiritualism, but Materialism. She is wise enough to see that whereas Materialism denies her claim to miracles, past or present, Spiritualism confirms the possibility of both. Rome is, therefore, essentially and necessarily spiritualistic.

Protestantism is not less essentially spiritualistic so far as she is "orthodox." There was a logical necessity for holding that miracles ceased with the Apostles, because Rome claims the Apostolic succession in that as in other matters; while Protestants were bound to deny, and so got into the way of denying, everything held to be supernatural. The outcome of Protestantism in Germany has been Materialism. The one vital opponent of Materialism everywhere is modern phenomenal Spiritualism. This is a fact that all religionists may as well consider.

The Western Gazette has an account of mysteriousappings, and a box jumping about, and persons seized with violent contortions, Salvation Army officers sent for, who wrestled for two hours in earnest prayer, and the police called in to keep the crowd and, if possible, the furniture in order. "The noise from the box," we read, "continued through the night, and the chairs and tables seemed possessed of the evil spirit." Here is a case for the "Society for Psychical Research"—an outbreak closely resembling that in the Fox family in America.

The same Western Gazette gives an account of "Faith Healings," at a Bethshan presided over by a Mrs. Alexander, where more than sixty persons have been anointed, resulting in many miraculous cures. The lame walk, the blind receive their sight, and a formerly crippled old lady is said to "skip about like a child." And why should not the S.P.R. examine and report upon the Bethshan miracles as well as other psychical abnormalities?

The Vicar of Yeovil presided at a lecture at Malvern, the other night, on the Approach of the Millennium, heralded by spiritualistic phenomena, which is the revival of necromancy. Mr. Wale, the lecturer, admitted that he had never attended a spiritualistic séance, but he had read about them, and had no doubt that "communication with departed friends was an established fact."

Thus we have one class of the opponents of Spiritualism insisting upon the genuineness of its phenomena as proof of its diabolism, and another class equally insisting that they are mere fraudulent tricks, too silly to deceive any sensible person. The best thing for any sensible man, who wants to know the truth, to do, is to find some genuine medium and make his own observations. If a man cannot credit such investigators as Crookes, Wallace, and Zollner, three first-class scientists, nor believe his own senses, he may as well give it up as a bad job. What such a man believes or disbelieves is a matter of no consequence whatever.

When a man has "made up his mind" to believe, or not to believe, and shuts his eyes, stops his ears, holds his nose, and refuses to examine anything, why disturb his serenity? If he enjoys his ignorance, why trouble to give him knowledge? Possibly the Egyptians were wise in keeping what they thought best worth knowing as sacred mysteries. It is not our modern fashion. We hold that nothing useful to man should be kept secret. We want the real facts of life, and we want no illusions.

The Banner of Light of May 2nd, is very rich in records of spirit manifestations. Allen Putnam, Esq., gives an account of a materialising séance, at which he saw, heard, and embraced his three successive wives, all happy to see him, and not in the least jealous of each other; an incident which may, perhaps, throw some light upon domestic relations in the world of spirits.

Mrs. Fletcher also gives a very interesting account of a séance with Miss Florence Cook in London, just after she was seized by the two ambitious Oxford students. Marie, a control of Miss Cook, gave what seemed to those present a reasonable explanation, which was that she, a spirit, was magnetically controlled by one of the expositors. However this may be, we know very well that a strong will may often mar or prevent manifestations. The two Oxford expositors once sat for nearly an hour with Mr. Eglington without even a rap or movement. They had no sooner left the house than jubilant raps were heard all over the table.

The outlook is brightened in America by the fact that an important paper, endorsing the phenomena of Spiritualism, by our distinguished naturalist, Mr. Alfred R. Wallace, has lately been published in the New York Tribune and other leading American journals.

The Popular Science News (Boston, U.S.A.) says of spiritual investigations: "In our view, a view derived from long and careful study, the observed phenomena presage the dawn of knowledge which will prove of the highest advantage to mankind. Of course, the knowledge of the truth in regard to past, present, and the future, must be good for us. No wise man wants to revel in a fool's paradise. Better know and face the truth than believe in the most fascinating falsehood. The rule of life should be, as far as possible, know what is. Learn the facts of life—past, present, and future. Face the truth and do not fear it. It is safest to know. 'Let me know the worst,' is a true instinct."

When things get to their worst they begin to mend, and when we come to a real knowledge of what is worst in ourselves and our surroundings, we begin to mend them. In this was the usefulness of "Outcast London" and the daily reports of police-courts in the newspapers. The real charm of the horrible is in the hope of some good that may come of such revelations. There may be moments of despair, but the true instinct is to make the world better. The tendency to good is far more powerful and enduring than any propensity to evil. There are ten optimists to one pessimist. Longfellow struck the true chord in his "Excelsior."

ITALY.—In Florence, spiritualist circles are increasing in number; in one there are manifestations by direct writing and by materialisations. Several university notabilities are investigating the phenomena.—Le Spiritisme.

Le Messager quotes from the Spanish journal Un Periodico Mas:—"Pio Nono ordered a column to be erected opposite St. Peter's, on Monte Janiculo, to perpetuate his proclamation of the dogma of infallibility, but the events of 1870 prevented. After his death his successor proposed to erect it on the part of the Monte belonging to the Spanish Government. In the meantime the Italian Government selected a contiguous spot on which to raise the monument decreed by the nation in honour of Garibaldi. The Pope, not being able to endure the thought of such contiguity, has, in consequence, had the infallibility column erected in a part of the Vatican gardens secluded from the sight of enfranchised Italians."

REVIEWS.

THE TRIUMPH OF LIFE. Mystical Poem. By Ella Dietz. E. W. Allen, London, 1885. Pp. 345.

Miss Dietz has now presented the public with three volumes of "mystical" poetry, the first entitled "The Triumph of Love," published eight years ago; the second entitled "The Triumph of Time," brought out last year, and recently noticed in these columns; and the volume now before us, "The Triumph of Life."

It would of course be hard to deny the privilege of "mystical" writing to be mystical; but on the other hand its great power and charm is lost when it either ascends so high as to be entirely unintelligible even to the reader who tries hard to appreciate it, or it degenerates into prose or verse without the vigour of inspiration, and in which ordinary analogies and metaphors are repeated over and over again with endless slight variations.

The present volume seems to us to partake so largely of the latter character that the gems of real poetry are few and far between. Hardly in a single page does the writer's muse appear to rise to the level which the mystical reader has a right to expect.

A study of the contents, and of the titles of the successive sections, affords some clue to the main idea the writer wishes to illustrate. The life of self-denial, the way of "The Cross," comes first. That is closed by a dream.

"Did I dream—that long ago Thou and I were one?"

"My chain I ever wear
My sorrow I must bear."

"I am not vanquished quite
By mortal pain,
I cleave unto the right
Though I be slain."

"Captivity long borne,
The resurrection morn
A thousand, thousand chains shall snap and break,
The captives shall go free,
In righteous liberty,
When God the heavens and earth shall shake."

Then follows "The Resurrection," then "The Castle of the Soul," and finally "The New Earth."

As in "The Triumph of Time," the writer seems to us to succeed best when least mystical. For instance, there is a great charm in some stanzas entitled "Early Love," though we fail to see the mysticism intended in their being an "Interlude" in "The Castle of the Soul." We quote the first verse.

"How I would like to be with thee alone
For days and days together,
To talk, and laugh, and sing till days were done,
In the blue cloudless weather;
To pluck bright flowers where sucks the honey-bee,
To laugh again when waters laughed, for glee;
Oh! shall we ever that sweet Eden see?
I wonder whether."

Other passages of this kind might be selected, but we feel bound to add that the frequent introduction of sacred names and images in association with phrases expressive of sensuous affection, produces a feeling of incongruity out of harmony with the religious mysticism which evidently imbues the mind of the writer.

If a selection could be made of the best passages from the three poems, a volume might be compiled which would often be turned to with delight by those who can appreciate both the ideas and the language of the writer.

SONGS OF THE HEIGHTS AND DEEPS. By the Hon. Roden Noel. Price, 7s. 6d. (London: Elliot Stock.) May also be obtained of The Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, W.C.

Poetry is the first expression of man's awakening sense and interpretation of natural objects and forces. In the childhood of the world and of races, all nature, inorganic no less than organic, is dimly discerned to be living, and the expression of a life greater than can be perceived by the outward senses. All natural forces and phenomena, whether apparently beneficent or adverse, are recognised as under the control of invisible powers who may be made wrathful or propitious through neglect or service of their worshippers. Hence the fear or reverence of nature as divine is the beginning of wisdom. All men are born poets, for although only the few in any age have both "the vision and the faculty divine," all have, in greater or less degree, the vision, or perception of the inner life and glory underlying all appearances, when their prophets give expression to the inborn thoughts of the seers.

Poetry is the appropriate language of religion, whether regarded as spiritual or natural; for when the one Divine life in its higher aspects is recognised in all diversity of manifestation, hills are said to rejoice, trees clap their hands, stars sing, thunders utter their voices, and winds and waves hear and obey the voice of superior will. So poetry, as it is the first and rudimentary expression of religious feeling, is also the last and highest. For humanity, in its journey from the East in natural childhood, returns thither with all the inherited wealth of experience and of wisdom as a child of the Kingdom of Heaven. Science, so far from withdrawing the veil of enchantment from creation's face, puts on another and thicker covering over the reality. There is no "Poetry of Science" as yet, for science is merely the imperfect interpretation and practical application of natural phenomena. "Whether there be knowledge it shall vanish away, for we see in part and we know in part;" but faith, hope, and love are eternal and unchangeable, and are the subjects of all true poetry.

Of such are these "Songs of the Heights and Deeps." Their author has already won well-merited recognition as a true poet by the ablest critics and the best known of contemporary poets; and if he is not as yet so fully appreciated by the general public, he may well afford to wait as others have waited, whose names are now household words. The heights and depths sung in this volume are both moral and physical. The "Lay of Civilisation," with which the book opens, is a "bitter cry" in prophet tones out of the depths for mercy and pity on the oppressed and helpless, not alone to God, as God is usually understood, but to God in man; to what is holiest and most compassionate in the deepest and highest nature of manhood—yet a cry of hope and assurance that the desire will obtain fulfilment.

"Through mystic change, or swift or slow,
Within the general bosom, and in ours,
Faith's inarticulate reason may grow clear,
Fair utterable vision: the wild dance,
The strange phantasmagory of ill dream,
Named sin and sorrow, may appear birth-pangs
Of life consummate, else impossible!"

Therefore, dear birds, in leafy woods ye warble,
And you, my children, by the riuulet
Play, laughing merrily, because the world
Is sound at heart, howe'er it seems to ail.
God-fronted, dragon-trained, 'tis but a marred
Image in souls, who travail yet ungrown,
Who, ruffled, slowly waver into rest."

The same thought of the unborn, underlying rest and blessedness of eternal life to be revealed is thus more fully expressed in the poem "Suspiria":—

"Is the world a welter of dream, with never an end, nor an issue,
Or doth One weave Dark Night with Morning's golden strand,
To a harmony with sure hand?"

Ah! for a vision of God! for a mighty grasp of the real,
Feet firm based on granite in place of crumbling sand!
O to be face to face, and heart to heart with our dearest,
Lost in mortal mists of the unrevealing land!
Oh! were we disenthralled from casual moods of the outward,
Slaves to the smile or frown of tyrant, mutable Time!
Might we abide unmoved in central depths of the spirit,
Where the mystic jewel Calm glows evermore sublime!
The dizzying shows of the world, that fall and tumble to chaos,
Dwell irradiate there in everlasting prime.

The innermost spirit of man is one with the Universal.

O'er the awaking infant, drowsing old, and the mindless
Their individual Spirit glows enthroned in Heaven,
Albeit at dawn, or even, or from confusion of cloudland,
Earth of their full radiance may remain bereaven;
Yea, under God's grand eyes all souls lie pure and shaven.

Discover but thy task, embrace it firm with a purpose,
Find, and hold by Love, for Love is Eternity."

That hero-worship, even when the heroes are mythical witnesses to the innate, abiding love of courage and goodness in the human heart, is thus fittingly expressed in "Tintagel":—

"I deem that in those clouds of the dim past
Tall, godlike forms loom verily; with us

Dwell souls who are not less magnanimous.
They pass, yet only to be self-fulfilled;
They pass, yet only as the All hath willed,
To enter on their full-earned heritage,
More righteous, and momentous wars to wage;
And if those heroes were not, then the mind
That holds high visions of our human kind
Is mightier than mighty winds and waves,
And lovelier than emerald floors of caves.
Nature Herself is the high utterance
Of holy gods; we, half-awake in trance,
Hear it confused; through some half-open door
We hear an awful murmur, and no more;
We are under some enchantment; lift the spell,
What mortal then the wondrous tale may tell?"

The heights and depths of nature of which the poet sings are mountain, lake, and sea. In two of these poems, "Thalatta" and "Suspiria," the rhythm is so well fitted to the nature of the subject that, in the words of a contemporary poet, his verse has "A great commanding motion,

Heaving and swelling with a melody
Learnt of the sky, the river, and the ocean,
And all the pure, majestic things that be."

"Melcha," the longest poem, is pregnant with suggestive thought relating to the inner world of vision, which, like the outer, is full of shadows testifying of realities which only become clearly seen when Christ is risen—that is, in the perfection of man's true being. In a note the author says that "though it is to be read primarily as a fairy tale, it is intended to convey a further meaning. Only that is not to be sought in every detail, because I think that in all works of art, the story, form, or concrete presentment of whatever kind, ought to be paramount, and the inner significance only implicit, or suggested. The reader, or spectator, moreover, has cause for complaint if the artist should, by over-insistence on this latter element, foreclose the right of all to find their own lesson or significance in a work of art. Barely didactic art there cannot be. But there should be more in a poem of this kind than the maker ever put there. . . . Time and place are not respected in the world of enchantment, which is also that of Thought, whence all Creation issues."

MRS. RICHMOND.—Mrs. Richmond will deliver the first discourse of this year's series on Sunday next, 17th May, at Kensington Town Hall (High-street), at 7 p.m. The discourses will be continued on the following Sundays. As Mrs. Richmond has not yet arrived we cannot announce the subject of the first discourse. The titles of the discourses for the following Sundays will be duly announced.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of this Society will be held on Friday, May the 29th, at the Rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, London, S.W. The chair will be taken at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which will be partly of a conversational character, is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to invite friends. Papers to be read: 1, Edmund Gurney, Esq., and Frederic W. H. Myers, Esq., "Some Higher Aspects of Mesmerism"; 2, R. Hodgson, Esq., "Final Report on Alleged 'Theosophical' Phenomena." Members and associates will be admitted on writing their names at the door. Persons who do not belong to the Society will be admitted on the production of an invitation card, duly filled in with one or more names, and signed by a member or associate.—EDWARD T. BENNETT, Secretary, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W.

A CLERGYMAN ON MAGNETISM.—Physicians tell us that the living human body is the receptacle of a certain modification of electricity, which, in action with the nervous system, is called animal magnetism; that this, in passing from one to another magnetically conveys temperature, feeling, even thought. This is felt by people when they are in very earnest converse. It is by this magnetism that the orator, actor, and musician hold their audiences spell-bound. People are harmonised or repelled in proportion to their capacity for mutually receiving and imparting this magnetism. Whilst the magnetic temperament is latent in all, it is only highly developed in some; in these latter the eye attracts and controls. The magnetic constitution is favourable to spiritual perception; in him who has it the wall separating him from the unseen world is indefinitely thinned. Its development and induction is favoured by meditation and prayer. The forces of the spiritual world move such men, and they acquire the power to act upon others, so that they can impart magnetically the gifts to men which they have received for men. The thoughts, feelings, looks, words, actions of such will be powerful over their fellows by virtue of their special magnetic constitution and their cultivation of it.—REV. H. R. HAWES.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHS.

By "LILY."

I have had many, through Mr. Hudson, that, to myself, are absolute tests, but one is so remarkable that I will relate my experience.

During my sances for spirit photograph with Hudson, I often longed and prayed mentally that a cross might come upon the plate with myself, but though many tests came when I sat, the cross did not, and as Hudson was going to move much further away, I feared all chance was over of my getting the longed for cross, when my last sitting with him (as I then thought) passed over without it.

A day or two afterwards, an extraordinary longing seized me to go once more to Hudson's, though I knew he was to move that very day; but so powerful was the feeling that I went. I found him, but everything was ready packed for removal the following morning.

I told him I had come for a sitting. This he declared to be impossible, everything being packed up; but, as I would not be denied, he unpacked his apparatus, and I sat for my photograph, having previously watched the hasty preparations made for it and the subsequent development of the plate: when lo! just over my head was a beautifully clear, large white cross!

I will not trouble you with my feelings on seeing my silent prayer at last answered. But, when the lovely cross appeared, I then, for the first time, told Mr. Hudson of it, and the poor old man's delight was unbounded.

SPIRIT INTERVENTION.

(EXTRACTED FROM THE Spiritual Offering.)

Thirteen years ago Mr. Samuel Smith, of Rockford, Illinois, a medium, was staying with us, and on one occasion, as my younger son, Harry, entered the room, said, while pointing at him under spirit-control, "That boy will be near dying in a few days, not by sickness; but he won't die." At that time I did not much heed such predictions. A week later the water of the house had, we thought, an ill taste; so we fixed a day for the water to be pumped out and the well to be cleansed. On that day I was called upon to make a journey, so the work had to be left to Edgar, my eldest son, and Harry. I charged them to let down a lighted candle to try if the air in the well was respirable before either of them got into it. This injunction was unheeded, the water was pumped out, the pump removed, and Harry was let down with the bucket for the cleansing. But he quickly called out, "I am sick." Edgar looked down, and seeing him holding his hands above his head, guided the rope into them; he grasped it, and Edgar quickly had him up. When clear from the well, Harry fell to the ground unconscious. But he gradually came round.

On my return next morning all this was reported to me, but Harry was quite himself again. We tried the air in the well; I lowered into it a lighted torch, Edgar a lively chicken; he drew the chicken up dead; my torch went out when three or four yards down. So we let well-cleansing alone for that day.

The same evening, Harry's hand, for he is a medium, was controlled to write, "Judge, I told you this boy would come near dying. Well, I helped to save him. We entranced him, and kept him alive in the well; we made him hold the rope fast, and helped him up." Edgar here said, "He felt light, and seemed to pop up."

In this incident my view is, that the boy being a medium, he had, in or about him, an element which enabled spirit friends to come into close contact with him and bring their psychical force into action in and about him to the effect thus described, for which we felt inexpressible thankfulness.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliottson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.
